VIRGINIA IS FOR LOVERS

In 1760, a young farmer came here.

He studied law...played the violin...and, ultimately, changed his life— and each of ours—forever.

His name was Thomas Jefferson. The place, Williamsburg, Virginia. The only fully restored colonial capital, it reminds us just what life was like when we were changing into a place called America.

Come to where it all began. Come experience Colonial Williamsburg.

1920's to the 1940's. Although the prices for furniture may be in the thousands, there are also inexpensive one-of-a-kind finds like the 1943 out-of-print recipe book of tropical drinks, cut out in the shape of a pineapple, that I bought for $23.

The fact that Moiliili is partly a college town helps keep restaurant prices down. In Catania, a cubicle-size Italian eatery, there's always a line for the heaping platters of heavily sauced, cheese-rich pastas. Fresh fish, five kinds of veal preparations, half a dozen chicken dishes and pastas that start at under $6 for the smaller portions make up the unremarkable but affordable menu. Those with a yen for dim sum go to Chan's Chinese seafood restaurant down the street. The best bet is takeout dim sum, a hearty selection of shrimp bao, pork shiu mai, custard tarts and crisp taro balls. Some like the chewy Okinawan doughnuts filled with coconut or black sugar.

Although Moiliili has never been known for fashion, side-by-side boutiques cater to opposite instincts. Nui Mono is slightly larger than a closet and chock-full of ethnic clothing — Indonesian ikat outfits; tribal rayon prints; moderately priced, easy-wear, elastic-waist pants in earthy, practical fabrics. No glitter there. But Luxe is as SoHo as Nui Mono is ethnic: outrageous hats, trashy bustiers, consignment clothing (some affordable gems there), art-sculpture hatboxes and accessories. Jewelry slaves save up to collect Sorrelli jewelry from Italy or the Robert Lee Morris silver bracelets.

Cafe Haleiwa, on the North Shore of Oahu.

Kaimuki

According to a 1979 issue of Historic Hawaii News, a field crew for the Historic Hawaii Foundation determined years ago that the 1,100-acre Kaimuki-Kapahulu area was "one of the least appreciated areas in Honolulu." Most notable in Kaimuki are its old wooden "forever homes" with quaint lanais, or verandas, surrounded by mango and pomelo trees and inhabited by families that built their homes in the 1920's and 1930's and don't intend to move. Although it lacks the exotic architecture of Manoa and Nuuanu, it is beloved for its neighborhood feeling and reliable, modest eateries.

Fashion, papayas and nostalgia

Nature's Basket in Manoa, four miles from downtown.

The newest is Coffee Talk, abuzz with caffeine lovers who come from all over town for scones, croissants, homemade fruit pies and a small selection of sandwiches at lunch. Original paintings add a hip flavor. Now, with talk of allowing sidewalk cafes and awnings in Kaimuki, change seems inevitable.

At Kaimuki Produce down the street, savvy retirees buy Kahuku papayas by the bushel; tangelos; lilikoi (passion fruit) and mangoes in season; Chinese taro, the starchy Hawaiian staple from which poi is made, and specialties like Grandma's Pineapple-Papaya Preserves, made by the co-owner Leona Chinen's "husband's boss's in-laws." The prices (the Kahuku papayas are sometimes just $1 a pound) are unbeatable, and you never know when you'll walk out with a fellow customer's generations-old taro recipe.

A few yards away, Azteca serves Mexican food with cilantro-laden salsa. Diners find Naugahyde booths among Mexican paintings and the usual psychedelically colored, south-of-the-border adornments over big platters of burritos and enchiladas. The enchilada plate comes in three sizes ($7 to $13.50). For dessert, there's Sweet Thoughts across the parking lot. Its chocolate decadence cake is a legend in Honolulu.

Kapahulu

Neighboring Kapahulu, just mauka of Waikiki, has its feet in two eras: the 1920's to 1930's and the 1990's. Residential Kapahulu is replete with prefabricated homes ordered from catalogues and shipped from the mainland decades ago for as little as $700. Today its commercial area, Kapahulu Avenue, is up-and-coming, lined with small, quirky businesses.

On On Chinese Restaurant, for example, is the classic good-food-and-no-ambiance Chinese diner, which does a brisk takeout business. Regulars may sit as far away from the television as possible and order Chinese cake noodles, the restaurant's specialty. The seafood version, like the On On special (with chicken, char siu and vegetables), is very good. Prices range from $1.45 for a single salted duck egg ("one only," the menu stresses) to $6 for the roast chicken cake noodle and $13.50 for the classic lobster with black bean sauce.

Java Java, a few blocks away, is this neighborhood's caffeine station, a starker, slightly colder version of Coffee Talk. Its upstairs Lizard Loft offers nightly entertainment: music, poetry, dramatic readings and experimental theater.

In contrast to all this hipness is the nearby Na Lima Mili Hulu No'eau, where a master feather worker, Mary Lou Kekuewa, her husband, Paul, and their daughter, Paulette Kahalepuna, teach the delicate, time-consuming and traditional art of making feather leis. The small, unremarkable shop is lined with feather leis and other Hawaiian crafts, with a worktable in the middle, which invites lingering and learning. There are a few lauhala hats made by a Kapahulu weaver, but the prime attractions remain the hatbands and leis in all the colors (some dyed) of contemporary avian life, lining the walls. Classes are taught on a walk-in basis, and students' work is for sale, from $20 to $900. There is a display of Mrs. Kekuewa's feather cape and a painting of rare and extinct birds whose feathers were used by the Hawaiian ancients.

A good way to cap a Kapahulu foray is in Hawaii Nostalgia, a narrow, alleylike shop cluttered with paintings, T-shirts, old Hawaiian sheet music, antique bottles and other memorabilia. The owner, Wayne Nishimoto, is an inveterate collector whose hand-printed signs are as entertaining as the items: "Old P.O. letter boxes from Schofield Barracks P.O., a gift from world traveler Joji Fujimoto. Thanks Joji. Very interesting piece! Bon Voyage!"

The shop sells everything from Chinese preserves and Japanese mochi crunch to José Pimental's wonderful paintings of long-lost Oahu landmarks: the old Tasty Broiler diner downtown, a street corner in Moiliili and the Kau Kau Korner restaurant, where the Hard Rock Cafe stands today. Old newspapers and radios, vintage bowling shirts, Matson cruise line place mats and other memorabilia choke this sentimental store.

Haleiwa

Across the island from these urban enclaves is the North Shore town of Haleiwa, where old storefronts, incense-scented galleries, cafes and surf shops compete. Ringing this neighborhood is a string of dazzling beaches: Waimea Bay, with its 20-foot winter waves; Sunset Beach, and its tube-laden Banzai Pipeline loved by surfers; and Haleiwa Beach Park, where local families hunt for seashells.

Breakfast might be at Cafe Haleiwa, a surfing shrine. You'll dine beneath surfboards and photos of mortals dwarfed by the behemoth waves they're riding. The fare is surfer-size and hearty: hefty burritos, omelets and pancakes with names like El Rollo, Off the Lip and Dawn Patrol. With refried beans, rice and home fries, and prices under $6, it's the North Shore way to start the day.

Across the street, behind the Celestial Health Food store, Paradise Found Cafe offers additional choices like soups, hummus, chapati wraps, sandwiches and its fabled vegetarian chili. The vegetarian menu includes a breakfast burrito of scrambled tofu in a whole wheat tortilla, a deal at $3.95.

Shoppers should look for the colorful T-shirts waving from clotheslines in front of Raising Cane. This unpretentious plantation storefront has some of the best aloha shirts and T-shirts in Hawaii, from the boldly graphic Out of Hand T-shirts and dresses to shirts, fabric and linoleum block prints by the Hawaii Island artist Avi Kiriaty. If Mr. Kiriaty's Hawaiian tribal designs don't win you over, then the Pineapple Juice aloha shirts ($54) with crisp Hawaiian and Asian motifs will. These are modern versions of the costly vintage "silkie" shirts popular in the 1930's and 1940's.

At the northern end of Haleiwa, behind an inviting garden with picnic tables, the Silver Moon Emporium reigns quietly. Devotees drive all the way from urban Honolulu to shop here for frosted glass candlesticks, beaded Mexican circular skirts, body-loving Uru Uru dresses, porcelain, eclectic jewelry and other adornments. You might spend anywhere from $15 for a pair of earrings to $200 or so for a timeless, flamboyant dress that will be equally at home at the movies or on the QE2.

It's a good idea to shop at Silver Moon before discovering Kua Aina, a minuscule roadside stand a few hundred yards away. Kua Aina offers good french fries, fish sandwiches and hefty cheeseburgers for $4.90. Lunch there might be topped off with a shave ice from the nearby Matsumoto Store. Sugary, tropical fruit syrups are poured atop mounds of shaved ice; aficionados like them with sweetened adzuki beans and ice cream. ■

KNOWN BY THOSE WHO KNOW NEW YORK

Last Saturday,
Mark and Terry drove into Manhattan,
where they parked their car at The Regency Hotel, checked into their lovely guest room,
spent this year's bonus on nearby Madison Avenue, took a carriage ride in Central Park (which they will never admit to their friends), giggled in the Met until they were asked to be quiet,

Libraries

Robert Royal for The New York Times

leen Davis, the center's director.

The Madrid library's general focus — the arts and humanities, economics, political science and international relations — can be judged by the contents of its shelves, which include, for example, the poetry of Carl Sandburg and Marianne Moore, books of folk songs and Broadway show tunes, encyclopedias, current issues of The New Yorker, The Village Voice and Art News. One thousand American citizens and 4,000 Spaniards are registered with the library, although no tally is kept of the number of visitors.

THE Washington Irving Center serves as a cultural center as well. In 1992 it housed over half the 250 cultural activities sponsored by the agency in Madrid. These activities included concerts, art exhibits and lectures.

When the Madrid library first opened, Franco's fascists regularly defaced books, destroyed exhibitions and even beat librarians, according to Jacob Gillespie, the public affairs counselor for the American Embassy in Madrid, while later anti-American demonstrations outside the library — most recently during the Persian Gulf war — have come from the other end of the political spectrum. Although the building has been the target of violence less often in recent years, there are armed guards and a metal detector at the front entrance.

Adjusting to recent cutbacks in funds, the Madrid library has recently trimmed the hours during which it serves the general public; currently its hours are 2 to 6 P.M. Monday to Friday. The card catalogue was also recently reorganized, weeding out books in Spanish and about Spain, in order to focus more on research about the United States.

Dr. Fulton says that despite a recent proposal in Congress to close the libraries in Western Europe — the proposal was defeated last summer — the role of the library program will not change, although individual card catalogues may.

"Whether it is Spain, Romania or Sierra Leone, we don't duplicate the information generally available in some indigenous library down the street," Dr. Fulton said. ■

Where to find the books

The United States Information Agency libraries around the world are keyed to the local environment and culture so hours of operation and user regulations will vary. Visitors wishing to make general inquiries can contact the library directly by telephone or through the nearest American Embassy or Consulate.

Requests for the addresses and telephone numbers of other libraries should be sent in writing to the Library Programs Division, U.S.I.A., Washington, D.C. 20547.

Flathead Lake

taken a dim view of reservation gambling. Since Polson holds little appeal for hotel-stayers, the lodge subsists now on conference business.

When we visited Polson last July, expecting to stop for lunch and instead staying three days, the newly opened hotel was nearly vacant, and all the more attractive for its quiet. Large rooms, with porches, look out over the vast lake. Two gift shops sold Indian artifacts, including the intricate beadwork for which the tribes are renowned. The cuisine was Continental, with sauces and seafoods seldom encountered in this steak-and-potato country.

The lodge's principal attraction is the lake itself. Rowboats and motorboats can be rented from the dock, and fishing tackle for the abundant lake fish, Dolly Varden trout, northern pike, mountain whitefish and rainbow trout among them. (The kokanee salmon, which once dominated the fish fauna of Flathead, have been largely eradicated with the introduction of a freshwater shrimp. Meant to be a fish food, the shrimp proved instead a more successful bottom-feeding competitor.) The angler's biggest rivals are the ospreys, which nest and troll along the lake.

At the Kwataqnuk Lodge we traveled by rented jet skis (motorized water skis). But there are slower, less noisy ways to traverse the enormous and calm waters. Cruise boats have been touring the lake for a century of summers and still do so daily from Polson and other points. A three-hour afternoon cruise heads north to Wild Horse Island, Montana's newest wildlife preserve. The rocky 2,700-acre island is devoid of habitation but is home to burgeoning populations of wild horses, bighorn sheep, introduced many years ago, and large elk and deer herds.

We also came across, and swam at, several rocky but pleasant beaches, including one beneath the bridge north of Polson. There we found a station of the Glacier Raft Company offering raft rides along the Lower Fork of the Flathead River. Impulsively, we signed on, and soon found ourselves hanging on for the best of several Rockies raft rides we've taken. The hour run proved not too tame for my 8- and 11 year-old girls, as the West Glacier raft rides down the middle fork of the Flathead River had been in midsummer, and not too rough, as were those we took on the Kootenai River in British Columbia.

The ride began below a hydroelectric dam at the base of the Hungry Horse Reservoir, the runoff from which insures swiftly flowing water even in the hot, dry Augusts. We bumped through Buffalo Rapids and bubbling Champagne Alley with just the right mix of danger and comfort. The trip ended with the guide and guests diving off the raft, in life vests, to glide serenely if swiftly along the river beneath sandstone cliffs and circling golden eagles.

Melita Island and beyond, Wild Horse Island, on the lake.

Birds of prey were by no means the only large animals we encountered in Flathead country. South of Polson off State Highway 212 near Moiese, in the 1.2 million-acre Flathead Indian Reservation, is the National Bison Range, a grassland and forest overlooking the Flathead Valley. The buffalo roam in this 20-mile-long enclosure, along with bighorn sheep, pronghorn antelope, white-tail and mule deer, elk and mountain goats. The park is negotiated by car, on two-hour or half-day routes, both of which afford abundant close-up views of the animals.

These and other animals are seen, as we discovered, far from protected enclosures and closer to human settlement in Flathead country. The proximity of untrammeled land, including the Bob Marshall Wilderness, e may be a factor. As one native Montanan author, M. R. Montgomery, puts it, "It looks so overdeveloped but a few miles off the main road in any direction and you are in wild country."

The abundance of wildlife is also a result of the Salish and Kootenai protection — only tribal hunting is permitted on the reservation. So even Polson itself is frequented by wildlife. The residents we talked to had stories of intimate encounters with large and frightening living things, whether it was the grizzly that stopped at the drive-in window of the McDonald's north of town last winter or the mountain lions that frequent backyards. Even we came close to an untoward ursine encounter when a large black bear bounded directly in front of our car just north of town.

We were headed, at last, toward Glacier, until we stopped again at Lake Mary Ronan, a small and pristine lake some 30 miles north of Polson and west of Flathead Lake. We found it on a branch road from the tiny Flathead shore town of Dayton. The shore of Lake Mary Ronan was almost entirely undeveloped (it's largely owned by a railroad) but for some slightly seedy cabin complexes. The exception was Camp Tuffit, a fishing camp much like the neatly groomed, family-filled cabins we've frequented in Maine.

Lake Mary Ronan is full of kokanee, bass and salmon, and Camp Tuffit is packed summers with fishing families, some of whom have been coming since before the owners, Gary and Mark Thomas, in their late 40's, were born. The hand-hewn tamarack lodges, with wood stoves, but no plumbing, were built by their grandfather, Charlie Thomas, a fruit farmer, at the turn of the century.

We navigated the lake by motorboat and rowboat and felt as if, for a few hours, we'd left Big Sky Country for our own New England. After a respite in Flathead, and the sort of quiet country we knew best, we were ready once more for a wilder Montana. ■

Lodging and activities

The Seasons

The weather in the area, like most of Montana, is cold and snowy most of the year with winds one resident swore "will push your tongue right down your throat."

May is cherry-blossom time, with abundant rains and an occasional killing frost. Summers are often sunny, with long warm days and cool nights.

Where to Stay

The Best Western Kwataqnuk Lodge in Polson, (406) 883-3636, is open the year round.

The 112 rooms each have two queen beds or one king bed and, from June 16, cost $85 to $105 a night. Right now they are $63 to $73.

Camp Tuffit on Lake Mary Ronan, (406) 849-5220, rents one-, two-, three- and four-room cabins, a few with plumbing and electricity, for $25 to $45 a night, with a two-night minimum. Food and nonperishable groceries are sold at the camp, but most visitors take supplies and do their own cooking.

Motorboats can be rented, but not tackle or canoes.

Camping, with showers, along the lake is found at Elmo State Recreation Area at milepost 28 on U.S. 93 north of Polson.

Sites and Events

The National Bison Range is open during daylight hours. Admission is $2 a vehicle.

Two intriguing little museums in the Polson area are the Polson-Flathead Historical Museum at 709 Main Street, with a Montana Fiddlers' Hall of Fame display, and the Miracle of America Story Museum on U.S. 93 south of town, which features a collection of historic vacuum cleaners.

Indian powwows are held in July and August in the Polson region, and a rodeo in July. For information on tribal activities call the Kootenai Cultural Committee at (406) 849-5541.

Theater and other festivals are held throughout the summer in the resort town of Bigfork on the northern end of the lake.

The Glacier Raft Company, (406) 883-5838, operates half-day trips along the Flathead River from beneath the bridge on the north end of town.

then show up at the courses that have caught their fancy.

My schedule of three guitar classes and a blues band lab revealed a variety of teaching methods. John Cephas is known for his smooth vocals and a sprightly finger-picking method known as the Piedmont style. Mr. Cephas, whose conversation is frequently punctuated by an explosive laugh, said that as a child he learned guitar by getting the musicians at local functions to teach him songs. That's the way he teaches at Augusta, repeating tricky guitar passages until his students get them right. It's a show-and-tell method that essentially re-creates the folkloric tradition. For that reason, and because these songs are impossible to master in just one sitting, many students chose to tape-record the lessons.

STEVE James is a Texas guitar player who takes a more modular approach to teaching, focusing on representative tunes in different keys and showing students a variety of modifications with which to customize the songs. Like Mr. Cephas, he had had the opportunity to learn from some of the seminal blues masters. Mr. James told one story about an impromptu guitar lesson from Furry Lewis. "Learn this riff," Mr. Lewis told the young picker, "and they'll give you 75 cents, a fish sandwich and all the moonshine you can drink."

Rich DelGrosso, coordinator of Blues Week, became a teacher at Augusta after coming as a student. During the year, Mr. DelGrosso teaches seventh- and eighth-grade science; at Augusta, he teaches the slide guitar. Mr. DelGrosso is one of the more organized instructors here, passing out written tablature for various tunes and leading the class through each and every measure. Like my other guitar teachers, Mr. DelGrosso did not give much advice about singing. After John Cephas played a song, I asked when he was going to teach us to sing like that, a question that elicited a good long chuckle.

The Blues Band Lab is especially valuable to players who might be shy about jumping into a jam session. The idea here is to create bands and work up a couple of tunes. The teacher was Jim Schwall, a singer-guitarist known for his years with the Chicago-based Siegel-Schwall Blues Band. He divided the class's two dozen students into four bands. I was placed in what became Code Blue, a combo featuring a pianist, a harmonica player and no fewer than four guitarists.

John Walker was Code Blue's secret weapon. Mr. Walker, a philosophy professor who moonlights as a professional country-blues singer, was quick to organize Code Blue into modestly adequate accompanists. I soon switched to slide guitar to give our string-heavy ensemble a bit more depth. Then, after starting to scribble new lyrics to "Dust My Broom" during the faculty's Tuesday night concert, I made the daunting decision to horn in on the singing.

The New York Times

My baby likes to dance Cajun, I tell her I like the blues.
My baby likes to dance Cajun, me I like the blues.
Last night I caught her dancing, with some cat who played the spoons.

During Augusta's summer of 1992, Blues Week coincided with Cajun Week, which made for some interesting jam sessions. But then, Augusta is a natural for intriguing encounters. At the cafeteria, you're as likely to eat with a retired couple sent to Elderhostel by their daughter as a doctoral candidate from Minnesota with a passion for the slide guitar. During a conversation with Jamal Koram, who was at Augusta teaching African-American Storytelling, I was intrigued to discover not only that we'd both grown up in Westchester County, but that before he became a professional storyteller, he'd sung Temptations songs in a soul band. I was also surprised to find that an acquaintance from college was the chief sound engineer at Augusta, and that a high school classmate was one of the guitar instructors. The lesson, it seemed, was that the roots of folklore are where we live — and play.

ON Wednesday night, Blues Week students were invited to a barbecue hosted by the Elkins Blues Week Women's Auxiliary. After hearty helpings of chicken, salad, cornbread and beer, the faculty started to jam, with the harmonica player Phil Wiggins and the guitarist Paul Geremia adding spice to a circle that included Mr. Cephas, Mr. Schwall, Mr. DelGrosso — and a jug of moonshine. Thirty yards away, Gaye Adegbalola led yet another student singalong.

While I wandered back and forth between these two musical circles, it became clear that this casual display of everyday artistry embodied the essential soul of Augusta. But the real message is that while it's fun to watch, it's even more fulfilling to participate. That's why, when I finally returned to my dormitory, I picked up my guitar and headed down to the Ice House. After just a few days, it felt entirely natural to go walking after midnight, strumming a guitar and looking for a jam session.

Gonna get up in the morning, believe I'll dust my room.
Gonna get up in the morning, believe I'll dust my room.
On Saturday I'll be leavin' Elkins, but I plan to come back soon. ■

Enrolling for Courses

A catalogue describing Augusta's music workshops can be obtained from the Augusta Heritage Center, Davis and Elkins College, 100 Campus Drive, Elkins, W.Va. 26241; (304) 636-1903, extension 209. A $40 nonrefundable deposit in required when registering before May 18; after that date, payment is required in full. (The catalogue also describes the craft classes, which are scheduled throughout the summer.) Instrumental instruction is available for beginner, intermediate and advanced students; when I attended, most students seemed to be in the intermediate range. The center is also your best source of information on off-campus accommodations, car pools and other travel information.

Major Theme Weeks

The schedule for this summer is as follows:

Old-Time Week (July 11 to 16): Regionally speaking, the musical heart and soul of Augusta, emphasizing the traditional string-band music and singing of the Appalachian region.

Blues Week and Swing Week (July 18 to 23): Some are disappointed that Blues Week isn't again paired with Cajun Week, but Swing Week should prove to be an equally interesting partner. One lesson of Augusta, after all, is that all types of American music are intimately connected.

Irish Week (July 25 to 30): Ballads, uillean pipes and more ballads. Irish Week is said to inspire particularly lively nights at the Ice House.

Dance Week (Aug. 1 to 6): Dance parties every night and classes on square dancing, New England contras, Appalachian clogging, tap and West African traditional dance. There's also a Caller's Workshop.

Bluegrass, Cajun, and Vocal Week (Aug. 8 to 13): The cross-pollination here could be intense, with bluegrass licks put to a zydeco beat and sung in a variety of styles. J. M.

Doing Shakespeare, on the Run

A hectic day's pilgrimage to Stratford begins at his burial site and ends with 'Hamlet'

By STEPHEN KINZER

LIKE countless other lovers of the English language, I have long been transfixed by the works of Shakespeare, and, still in my teens, I resolved someday to draw the Cotswold air he once drew. I envisioned a leisurely week-long tour through Shakespeare's life, embracing sightseeing and a few evenings at the theater, perhaps a lecture or two, and some quiet hours for reading and reflection.

This travel fantasy, like many, proved too time-consuming to realize. When I finally got around to making my trip, I found myself with just one free day. To attempt such a pilgrimage in so short a time is of course folly, but having waited so long, I was determined not to cancel. How much Shakespeare, I wondered, could I fit into a single day in Stratford? Dusk was settling over the town as I arrived in my rented car that Friday.

That I had come to the right place was evident as I passed the Shakespeare Hotel and Restaurant, the Shakespeare Coffee House, Shakespeare's Doorstep Bed & Breakfast and the Bard's Cottage Cafe. Unable to restrain myself, I made my way to Stratford's central shrine, the gabled house on Henley Street where Shakespeare was born. It was larger than I had expected, restored handsomely and with appropriate dignity. Tourists photographed each other in the fading light.

On my big day I was awake and on the streets before almost anyone else. I had determined the previous evening that the first Shakespeare site to open would be Holy Trinity Church, where the poet is buried. I arrived at 8:32, just behind the vicar.

After making a brief show of admiring the church's stately interior, I edged toward the alcove where the sacred remains are interred. There a slab of stone bears an epitaph Shakespeare himself is said to have written:

Good friend for Jesus sake forbeare
To digg the dust enclosed heare;
Bleste be ye man yt spares these stones
And curst be he yt moves my bones.

The souvenir stand in the church was not yet open as I left, and as there was no time to waste I bade a quick farewell to the vicar and continued on my way. I stopped for only a brief moment to admire Holy Trinity's pastoral setting, its spire soaring above the placid Avon River as in Shakespeare's day.

The Bard's birthplace opened at 9:30, and here I was not the first but the second visitor of the day. The man ahead of me, a Canadian, was watching the beginning of a half-hour video as I arrived. I joined him, and heard that Shakespeare was born here in 1564, and that at 18 he married Anne Hathaway, who was practically an old maid at 26. He is said to have fled Stratford years later to avoid prosecution for deer poaching.

At the rate my clock was ticking I couldn't spare time to see the whole video. I also skipped the adjacent display of costumes from famous theatrical productions, and walked down a footpath to the "birth house." Inside, I marveled at the divine mystery of genius, as I had when visiting Beethoven's birthplace in Bonn. I did not, however, feel the same chill that came over me when I stood at the desk where Dostoevsky wrote large sections of "Crime and Punishment," or when I looked through the window that was Melville's as he struggled with "Moby Dick." Shakespeare lived in this house as a youth, before beginning his writing career. The house is original, but none of the furniture or fixtures are.

Time to jump on the bus to Anne Hathaway's cottage, a couple of miles outside town. Here the furnishings remain much as they were 400 years ago, and among the attractions is the "courting bench" upon which Will and Anne became acquainted. An adjoining garden has been planted with trees, shrubs and herbs mentioned in Shakespeare's plays.

Here comes the return bus! Back in town there was a little time for shopping, but I found few trinkets that rose above the level of junk. I have fairly low standards and would happily have come home with not just a set of Shakespeare cufflinks but also a Julius Caesar key chain, a Lady Macbeth coffee mug, a Shylock pen-and-pencil set or a pair of Falstaff suspenders. However, I found none of these items.

Of reading matter, joyfully, there was no lack. Colorful pamphlets about the town and its immortal son were available everywhere. At one shop, a large floor-to-ceiling bookcase was crammed with hundreds of titles like "Shakespeare as Political Thinker" and "he Women in Shakespeare's Life." Tacked to the top shelf was a note explaining, "This rack can hold less than 5 percent of our total stock of books on the life and works of Shakespeare." I could lose myself in such a place, but not this day. At another shop, however, I bought several books. One contained an essay arguing that Richard III may actually not have murdered his two innocent young nephews in 1483, as Shakespeare proclaimed. Another was a collection of poems about Shakespeare, including one in which Thomas Hardy calls him "Bright baffling soul" and another in which John Keats addresses him "O golden-tongued Romance, with serene lute!"

MY midday rest stop at the hotel had to be quick. At 1:30 lights would dim for the matinee performance of "Richard III," and I had been holding a ticket for several months.

Zounds! This Richard seemed an enormous figure, much bigger than Laurence Olivier in the classic film and other svelte actors like Al Pacino I've seen in the role. But as the play progressed, I realized the actor Simon Russell Beale was not that tall or fat. It was the intimacy of the 450-seat Swan Theater, together with some artful costuming and makeup, that made him seem so.

My program said the intermission would last 20 minutes, which by that day's standard was more than enough time for me to view the "theatrical museum" upstairs. The museum turned out to be a collector's attic full of costumes, paintings and artifacts ranging from a sword used onstage by Paul Scofield to a pair of gloves supposedly worn by Shakespeare himself. My favorite item was an allegorical painting centered around a crying baby entitled "The Infant Shakespeare Attended by the Passions."

The performance was wonderful, lending credence to the Royal Shakespeare Company's claim to be "the finest classical theatre company in the English-speaking world." Afterward I crossed the street for a snack at a fish-and-chip cafeteria. It was the only place I visited all day where I heard no foreign languages spoken. Back at the hotel, there was time only to wash and have a quick drink. The evening performance of "Hamlet" at the 1,500-seat Royal Shakespeare Theater was to be from an uncut script, and would begin at 6:30 to accommodate its four-and-a-quarter-hour length.

The star of this "Hamlet" was none other than Kenneth Branagh, whose recent film of "Henry V" has made him arguably the most popular Shakespearean actor alive. He was, predictably, riveting. The timeless tragedy was played against a 19th-century background, with props including bowler hats, watch chains, a pistol and a copy of the Copenhagen newspaper Politiken.

After the final curtain came down, I ambled slowly along the Avon, as Will must often have done, and found a tavern called the Slug and Lettuce. People were inside, but the front door was locked. 11:05 P.M., and foiled once again by damnable British pub-closing laws!

At the hotel I joined several other guests, all carrying "Hamlet" programs, at the parlor bar. A tourist brochure there listed several Shakespearean shrines I had missed. Nonetheless, I had absorbed a strong dose and carried out a long-delayed mission. Let Hercules himself do what he may, the cat will mew, and dog will have his day. ■

It was the best of times.

It was the worst of times.

We did well in both.

Anyone can work magic with your personal portfolio in an up market. But The Boston Company has done reassuringly well in down markets, too. That's because we focus on achieving consistent growth for our clients over the long term. Find out what our money managers can do for your personal portfolio of $1 million or more. You Might Expect A Luxury Cater To Your Senses. But All Six Sedan To Of Them?

The sixth sense is a keen, highly intuitive power – a power of perception – that goes far beyond the five senses. That's according to the dictionary.

According to our engineers, it comes standard with every Lexus ES 300. Let us explain.

Have you ever been in a new place and felt like you had been there before? Some call it déjà vu, but we call it ergonomics: the uncanny ability of a Lexus cabin to have everything in exactly the place you would most likely want it.

So whether it's the knob for the climate control system or the switch for the power window or the buttons for the optional six-disc CD auto-changer, or whatever– the first time you reach for it, the very first time, it will be there, as if you had placed it there yourself. Kind of spooky.

Of course, we also do a lot for your other senses: the look of a sleek, aerodynamic body, the feel of gentle lumbar support, the smell of available handcrafted leather upholstery, and the soothing sound of eight strategically placed speakers.

As for taste, it's in everything we do. Figuratively speaking, of course.

LEXUS
The Relentless Pursuit Of Perfection.

©1993 Lexus, A Division Of Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Inc. Lexus reminds you to wear seat belts and obey all speed laws. For more information, call 800-872-5398 (800-USA-LEXUS). For the hearing impaired, call 800-443-9992.

What's a million dollars worth these days?

Our undivided attention, for starters.

Many people of means believe the services of a personal investment manager are out of reach. But The Boston Company brings personal, hands-on wealth management to households of $1 million or more. We can probably manage your money more effectively, and at a lower cost, than you're doing now. For more information, call us at 1-800-582-9423, ext. 225.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

In These Girls, Hope Is a Muscle

Madeleine H. Blais's article "In These Girls, Hope Is a Muscle" (April 18), about the Amherst, Mass., Hurricanes, is a great American story. I got goose bumps. I cried; I laughed; I identified. I was there.

Finally, the true female personality is revealed. Finally, the lives of courageous, scrappy, stoutehearted, fierce, intelligent young women are celebrated.

I would welcome more stories like this in your magazine because, as Mae West said, "Too much of a good thing is wonderful!"

DOROTHEA LOCKHART
Jersey City

It's hard to say which I enjoyed more — the story itself or the humorous and dead-on way in which Madeleine Blais captured the town of Amherst.

Her article should be read by all junior-high-school students. Girls will learn that their athletic abilities are valued and boys will learn that girls' sports matter. They might even learn something from the girls.

KRISTA DABAKIS
Troy, N.Y.

Blais caught the spirit of the game and the closeness of young women on a high-school team.

My oldest daughter was our family "jock." She, too, played high-school basketball. Her team never reached the state championship level, but your article reminded me of the camaraderie of that wonderful group of girls. Although women's sports have "come a long way, baby," there are still a lot of doors closed — but I guess not in Amherst anymore!

JEAN M. COHEN
Carmel, Ind.

I have no interest at all in basketball.

As a man in his 70's, I have no interest whatsoever in girls of high-school age. Or, aside from my wife, of any age.

Yet the article on girls' basketball was so well done, so enrapturing, that I read it with enormous enjoyment. Madeleine Blais surely belongs on your team.

HENRY MORGAN
New York, N.Y.

Toward the end of the article, when Blais bestowed upon the team the well-earned title of "women," I wept with hope and joy. At a time when Susan Faludi's book "Backlash" has a great deal of resonance, it is heartening to find young women receiving deserved support from parents, schools, coaches and the news media.

BETTINA SLUSAR
New York, N.Y.

Colonialism's Back

What? "Colonialism's Back — And Not a Moment Too Soon" (by Paul Johnson, April 18)? O.K., I get it. If you can't run your own affairs and get into a mess, then the world can take you over, like a demented relative or something. You lose all sovereignty for, say, "50 years, or 100," until you can be declared competent by "civilized" standards.

Is it fair to limit the application of this concept to third-world countries, as Johnson does? Is our Western bias showing here? Why not throw in Italy, for sure, and maybe Ireland or India? Russia meets some criteria now and may qualify later. The Balkans, you bet, should be under trusteeship and let's make Johnson first viceroy. Say, once you grasp the principles, this gets to be mildly entertaining, like Monopoly.

CLIFFORD L. PIPER
West Hartford, Conn.

Paul Johnson's article dignifies what some of us in foreign service (in my case, retired from that of the United States) increasingly felt but seldom dared to say for fear of banishment from our profession.

As a result of close exposure to the Middle East and parts of Asia from the 1950's into the 1970's, I shifted from the liberal to the conservative position on self-determination. Some countries simply were unable to govern themselves and were better off under 20th-century colonialism or trusteeship. Underscore 20th century.

The world was better off as well, but whether the colonial power or trustee felt that it was is another matter — ask Great Britain about Palestine or France about some of the Arab countries between World Wars I and II.

And that may be what most weakens the author's proposal. Although he sensibly urges renewal of the trusteeship system, how does he suggest you persuade a Western nation to take on the troubles and obligations of trusteeship? This is only the second hurdle; the first is to get United Nations agreement on nations acceptable as trustees.

ROBERT A. LINCOLN
McLean, Va.

Johnson's article distorts colonial history, gives no explanation of why many non-Western countries are in difficulties and offers no reason why former colonial powers, having made a mess of things the first time around, are now in a position to act in an "altruistic" manner to save former colonial populations from themselves.

Although Johnson — drawing his examples from Africa — carefully avoids any explicit argument about the inferiority of African societies, he seeks no alternative explanation for their problems. He holds colonialism blameless, but few scholars would accept his contention that colonial rule was "reluctant" or welcomed or that it brought order to African chaos. Colonial rule destroyed order as much as it created its own particular forms of political stability. Colonial authority was challenged, peacefully and violently, from the beginning of colonization to the end. Nor did Europe suddenly exit, leaving Africans in a helpless vacuum, for ex-colonies were quickly enmeshed in relationships of political clientage and economic dependence. The worst cases of misrule, like Zaire's Mobutu, were joint Euro-African ventures. The earliest principled critics of African misrule have been Africans, but Johnson ignores this in favor of a sharp distinction between the fit and the unfit, the "civilized" West and the uncivilized rest. Such thinking has long been an instrument of coercion and denigration.

For once, you have chosen to be correct, instead of "politically correct."

I was born and lived until I was 30 (I am 66 now) in one of those countries "full of sound and fury signifying nothing," so I can only say "amen" to your author's statement that "Some countries are just not fit to govern themselves."

The United Nations — and especially Americans — believe that getting rid of the dictator on duty (whether he is called "presidente," "prime minister," etc., makes no difference) and telling the people of the country that they are now a democracy will solve all the problems. Only persons who were born and raised in such countries know how illusory that is. Democracy implies individual responsibility, respect for your neighbor's rights, collaboration for a common goal and unity of purpose. Try to make someone understand this who has lived all his life in poverty and ignorance, surrounded by violence and corruption.

SITTING PRETTY

I experienced a number of conflicting emotions while reading Margo Kaufman's Hers column "Sitting Pretty" (April 18). As a child of the 1960's, I rejected all superficial efforts to make myself attractive according to a male definition of beauty. However, I have, with age (and the moderation that naturally attends that process), moved back into a mainstream position — in practice. In theory, I continue to struggle with it.

But the message that comes through loud and clear in Kaufman's essay is how important it is to allow our mothers to speak to us in the language of comfort that is unique to them. For Kaufman's mother, it was beauty; for mine, it is food. To look beyond the gesture, to recognize and gratefully accept the love that it represents — that is the tie that bonds.

nana growers with additional charges of using pesticides and fertilizers and converting rain forests into "monocultures" (evidently the bugaboo of multiculturalists). He wrote: "My organization has begun a voluntary program called the Smart Banana Project, to work with banana producers in improving their environmental standards without affecting productivity."

This line caused me to fall out of my chair. Why? Surely Mr. Katz's point — "we support reform of the banana industry, rather than a boycott" — is a serious one, not funny in the least. Then why do we smile at the prospect of the need for banana reform, and double up in consideration of the Smart Banana Project? If health reform is important, why is not banana reform? If smart bombs are not funny, why are smart bananas? (Just envision those smart bananas, dropped from a banana plane, zeroing in on the banana boycotters in the rain forest; oh, what a lovely war.)

Straighten those faces; let's try again. In the current issue of The International Economy, an article by Klaus C. Engelen, an editor of Handelsblatt in Düsseldorf, is headed "Is Helmut Kohl Cracking Up?" The piece discusses the pervasive Endzeitstimmung, the mood that the regime is coming to an end, and gives five reasons why Chancellor Kohl, though often highly regarded abroad, is so resented at home.

These reasons for the potential downfall of a Western leader range from "For not shutting the borders sooner on floods of asylum seekers" to "For letting bureaucrats from Brussels cause mass layoffs in Germany's steel plants."

Then comes the crusher: "For standing by as the French protect bananas from their former colonies, forcing the Germans to eat expensive, puny, shabby bananas."

Does Kohl realize he is about to be done in by the fallout from puny bananas? Is there a word in the German language for "shabby bananas," and does Helmut Kohl know it?

I rest my case: there is no way of dealing seriously with the Banana Question. Nobody with a straight face is going to fight for banana reform because bananas, smart or shabby, are inherently funny. ("When you get to my age," says octogenarian Milton Berle, "you don't buy green bananas.") Chomsky, get onto this: it must have something to do with the deep structure of the word itself.

WHENCE WHITE?

THE WORD WHITE, AS A racial description that used to be euphemized as "Caucasian," is being blackened.

In one of his sprightly, insightful (why am I doing a blurb when he hasn't written a book?) essays in U.S. News & World Report, John Leo addressed "The demonizing of white men." He opened with a grabber of a lead: "Attention, men of the Caucasoid persuasion."

In a Washington Post article about the Financial Accounting Standards Board, Jay Mathews wrote that the F.A.S.B.'s (sometimes pronounced FAS-bee's) "members are drawn from the upper reaches of the accounting profession, and have so far been all male and all European American." My colleague Floyd Norris, in the Times financial news section, notes this usage and wonders: "The new euphemism for white?"

Caucasia is a region between the Black and Caspian Seas that takes in parts of Russia, Georgia, Armenia and Azerbaijan, and is marked by the Caucasus Mountains. The term Caucasian was used by the German anthropologist Johann Friedrich Blumenbach around 1800 to describe whites, who he thought originated there; other 19th-century anthropologists expanded the area to Europe and North Africa, with the people of darker as well as lighter skins, but the whole racial category was abandoned by most scientists a century ago.

What, then, to call people who are not what used to be called black or yellow or brown or red? I see nothing that has to be euphemized about any of those colors, so long as you don't pretend it represents scientific differentiation. White is loosely nearly accurate, though a case can be made for the word chosen by the actor Peter Ustinov when asked his color; he wrote in "pink." ■

What's So Funny About Bananas?

THE WORD BANAna makes people smile; why?

Maybe it's the spelling. Hubert Horatio Humphrey, who knew he had a tendency to speechify at great length, liked to say, "I'm like the little boy who knew how to spell banana, but never knew when to stop."

Perhaps it's the sound that gives the word a comical air. "You say ba-NAA-nuh, I say ba-NAH-nuh," goes the lyric to the Gershwin song "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off"; it could be the NAA pronunciation that triggers the amusement.

Or it could be the fruit itself, a sunny yellow curved in the shape of a smile, as if to say, "Have a Nice Day." Denuded of its skin, the fruit offers us a banana peel, on which one slips to the great hilarity of onlookers.

In old American slang, banana oil means "nonsense" (its humorous connotation far different from snake oil, meaning "fraudulent"). A top banana is a leading comedian. To go bananas is to go crazy, and the nonsensical meaning is reflected in the verse of another 1930's song, "But Not for Me," from the Gershwins' "Girl Crazy": "I never want to hear/From any cheerful Pollyannas/Who tell you fate/Supplies a mate;/It's all bananas!"

A banana republic was not just a country that produced profits for the United Fruit Company; it was a country with a rinky-dink government, having "backwardness" as its hallmark (until the name was adopted by an American retailer; now it has a yuppie connotation). A banana boat is a very slow boat.

Economists know it's funny, too. When Alfred Kahn, Jimmy Carter's anti-inflation czar, was told by his political superiors never to use the word recession, he agreed to substitute the word banana; he was soon heard muttering about "the worst banana you ever saw."

Perhaps it is the context that gives the word its humor. Let's deal with the word in a serious vein and see if a context of gravity wipes the smile off our face.

A recent front-page article in The New York Times, headlined "A Forbidden Fruit in Europe: Latin Bananas Face Hurdles," dealt with the crisis being felt by banana growers in the face of new quotas and tariffs by the European Community protectionists. That's surely serious, affecting profits, jobs, international relations, calling for all due solemnity.

out to be very much at its best. The old confusion of love and sex and death carried (safely) to the limit; a modest act of defiance, a declaration of life, thumbing our noses in the face of the beast.

And then I take his hand and he takes it back and pulls on his clothes and goes home to his dying-as-we-speak companion.

The next day, Saturday, I meet for coffee with Fred, a friend whose companion of 12 years died a couple of months ago. As we talk the sun moves around to the west and catches Fred's graying hair. I'm not certain of his H.I.V. status, but the sun catches his graying hair and the parched skin stretched over his temples — the veins glow blue through the translucent flesh and I'm certain he's taking AZT. I've come to think of this premature aging as a side effect of the drug, or maybe of H.I.V., or maybe both. I look at my friend so sunk in grief and feel first grateful, then guilty, knowing that however tough things are, at least I have a full year of grieving behind me, and that I, a healthy, H.I.V.-negative man, will surely come easier than he to hope — for another love, another life.

Fred tells how when he started losing weight, his sympathetic boss arranged to hire him full time for the minimum number of months required to qualify him for disability payments. (I was right in my guess about his H.I.V. status.) So he's working in this high-powered venture-capital start-up even though he hasn't any energy or desire to work — he goes to work knowing that everyone around him is working 50-, 60-hour weeks, but he just goes in and stares out at the traffic and waits for the day when he can quit and go on disability.

Then he talks of taking his companion's ashes to Paris to scatter and begins to weep and I want to hold his hand but don't — all this death and I'm still trapped in that man thing. He's maybe 40, a boyish face. He once looked younger than his years but now he looks older. There's no putting an age to him because his is not an aging that has come about from time's passing. As he speaks he is dwelling not in hope but in memory, and it is this, more than the graying hair, that is making him old.

I walk him to his car and give him a big hug and promise to call, wondering where I will find time in my life, room in my heart for another friend confronting his death.

And now it's a week later, and I have for the first time since my companion's death a real date, with a landscape architect whom I'm taking to a play. Tom, my date, is a nice-looking guy with a steady paycheck — every writer's fantasy. When he tells me he's reading a novel, I'm impressed and for a long minute bedeviled by stupid, involuntary fantasies of a partner, someone to fill this void in my life.

So it's after the play and he's driving us back to my car and the air is charged with possibility. Never good at leaving well enough alone, I break the silence by asking what he's reading, which turns out to be Stephen King, but that's O.K., I don't hold it against him. "I'm an Anne Rice fan myself," I say. From "The Vampire Lestat" it's an easy non sequitur to complaining about the mess of blackberry briers my landlord calls a yard. "What you need is a landscape architect," Tom says.

"We'll both be old men before I can afford you," I say.

An awkward pause. Tom clears his throat. "There's something you ought to know," he says, but I know it already, I don't need to be told and I don't want to hear it. I cover his free hand with mine. "Next date," I say.

And now I'm homeward bound after a chaste peck on the cheek from Tom and all I can manage is a sad smile, but the next day when I tell this to a straight friend from the suburbs he looks at me as if I'm losing my mind. And maybe I am; or is this just the difference between those inside the epidemic and those looking on? What have I been brought to? "The lucky fellow," Elie Wiesel writes of the terrorist leader in "Dawn." "At least he can cry. When a man weeps he knows that one day he will stop." ■

ABOUT MEN

BY FENTON JOHNSON

Lucky Fellow

A LONG YEAR AND then some since my companion died of AIDS, and it's a Friday, the birthday of Mark, an old friend whose companion of a decade has been dying-as-we-speak for the last two years. Early in the day I call and offer Mark these options: 1.) Coming to my place for lunch; 2.) Going out for lunch, my treat. He chooses coming to my place, which on this particular day carries some sad and delicious possibility of making love.

So, fine. I'm enthused at the excuse to leave work to spend a Friday afternoon with drop-dead handsome Mark. We never talk of our companions, dying or dead, but we have established that it has been years since Mark has made love, and nearly as long for me. We've carefully avoided talk of the future, content with holding another person's commiserating hand. (The hand-holding has been mostly metaphorical, Mark being caught up in that man thing, and also after two years of living-with-dying very much into guarding his heart.)

So I go out and buy birthday candles and a couple of chocolate cupcakes and a book for a gift, and come home and wrap the book and set the table and stick the candles in the cupcakes and take a shower.

And I'm climbing from the shower and searching for a clean pair of Calvin Kleins when the phone rings and it's Mark, saying that his companion just got the results from his latest test and it's Pneumocystis again, and his doctor has exhausted all drugs to treat it and doesn't know what he can do, and Mark wants to spend the afternoon consoling his companion at this latest, grimmest turn of events.

So, fine. I hang up, get dressed (the ragged old Fruit of the Looms will do) and eat my bowl of soup and one of the chocolate cupcakes and resign myself to resuming work, albeit without much enthusiasm.

And as I'm sitting to my work the phone rings again, and it's Mark again, and the doctor has called back to say there's this one experimental drug he has remembered that he hasn't yet tried on Mark's companion and he's sending it over to start treatment right away. And since for the moment Mark's companion is feeling O.K., all things considered, and since it is Mark's birthday, maybe he will come over for lunch. So he does in fact come over, and I feed him soup and light the candles on the remaining cupcake. He carves it in two and gives me half, and in his gesture I understand what we both want: that short triumph over fate, over time and memory and circumstance that desire may bring at its best.

And on this day it turns

Kosovo as their land; they revere it as the holy cradle of Serb nationhood. And the hatred they feel toward the Albanians dwarfs what they feel for the Bosnian Muslims. Albanians, many of whom fought against the Serbs during World War II, make up 90 percent of Kosovo's population and differ from the Serbs in religion and language.

A conflict in Kosovo — a province of Serbia — is unlikely to be confined within its borders. Here is the nightmare scenario. The Serbs move against the Albanians in Kosovo, which shares a border with Albania and Macedonia. Albania comes to their aid. The large Albanian minority in Macedonia also rises in revolt against the Slavic majority. (An independent country since November 1991, Macedonia was recently seated at the United Nations under the name Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.) Serbia takes this as a pretext to invade Macedonia, which it calls "South Serbia." Greece and Bulgaria invade as well, since both countries think of Macedonia as their own.

If a general Balkan war breaks out, Turkey — the age-old enemy of the Serbs that has been at loggerheads with Greece over Cyprus since 1974 and that is still smarting under the forced exodus of 310,000 ethnic Turks from Bulgaria in 1989 — might feel compelled to intervene on behalf of the Albanian Muslims. And if the Turks jump in, conceivably Russian nationalists could then openly throw their weight behind the Serbs.

ON THE BUS FROM BELGRADE down to Kosovo, Albanians lounged in the back. Serbs clustered around the driver. I was left in the empty middle. In Pristina, the capital of the province, one of the Serbs attached himself to me as I headed for the cheaper of the city's two hotels. He was a policeman, rotated down to Kosovo to keep order. Had I been to Kosovo before?

"Travel writer."

"Ah, you've come to see the Serbian monasteries."

"Exactly."

Emerging from the back alleys of gold filigree shops and teahouses, we got onto the main street, Marshal Tito Avenue. It was evening and the promenade was in full swing under the sweetly flowering lindens. Policemen strolled, cradling their submachine guns.

Two years before, the Hotel Kosovski Bozur had Albanian maids and an Albanian desk clerk and a room had cost $14. Now the place was run entirely by Serbs. "Not filthy anymore," my escort told me. It looked the (Continued on page 44)

The Serbs view Kosovo as their Jerusalem. How long before it becomes their next target?

BY BRIAN HALL

PHOTOGRAPHS BY ANTONIN KRATOCHVIL

IN A SMALL, MUDBRICK village tucked away in the hills of Kosovo in southern Serbia, I was sitting on a cushion on the floor of a bare, whitewashed room with the men of an extended Albanian family. We ate flija from a common pan. As a national dish of the Albanians, flija said something about the grinding poverty of the region. Made out of nothing but flour and milk, it went down like successive flaps of rubber matting.

Afterward, cigarettes were passed around. We leaned back against the cushions and drank quarts of sweet, strong, lemony tea. The patriarch regarded me with his deep blue eyes, meditatively smoothing his snowy mustache, and asked why I wasn't building a munitions factory in Kosovo. "He assumes every American is a wealthy capitalist," his nephew explained to me. I apologized for not being able to do so.

"And why doesn't America give Albanians the atom bomb?" the patriarch went on.

"To use on the Serbs, you mean," I said.

"Well . . . " he demurred, with a turn of the hand. A soft smile went around the room.

"The current thinking in Washington," I tried to explain, "is that such a move would be destabilizing."

We had this conversation more than a year ago. Since then, the kind of traveling I was doing in Kosovo — an informal wandering, staying with families, without official permission or oversight — has become impossible for foreigners. Since then, especially in light of the Serbs' devastating "ethnic cleansing" campaign in Bosnia, Kosovo's potential for destabilization, even without the atom bomb, has increased tenfold. All the Bosnian elements are there, but in starker form.

The Serbs do not merely look on

Sister Sympathy

Working both sides of death row, Helen Prejean ministers to killers and to the families of the people they've killed.

BY SUE HALPERN

Making a connection: Sister Helen Prejean visits a convicted murderer in prison for life.

PHOTOGRAPH BY WILBERT RIDEAU/THE ANGOLITE FOR THE NEW YORK TIMES

"HOW WILL I RECOGNIZE YOU?" I ASK Sister Helen Prejean the day before I am to fly down to Louisiana to interview her. It is a question you ask a stranger, which is what she is in a physical sense, but only that. We have been corresponding for nearly three years, ever since she started writing a book about her experiences with men on death row; at the time, I was working on a book about solitude, and wanted to include a chapter on solitary confinement. Sister Prejean put me in touch with an inmate in solitary whom I interviewed by mail. Meanwhile, Sister Prejean was sending me pieces of her manuscript as it emerged. It told the story of the condemned men, the murderers, who became her friends, and the families of their victims with whom she sometimes found common, if shaky, ground.

"You'll know who I am," Sister Prejean tells me, laughing. "I'll be the one with the aura."

AS IT HAPPENS, I MISS THE AURA AND MISS the nun and have to have her paged. Helen Prejean turns out to be short, a little chunky, with trim brown hair and glasses. She looks like a lot of other middle-aged women at the Baton Rouge airport but she moves faster, more formidably. You don't want to get in her way.

So I shouldn't be surprised that when she drives, she speeds. Sister Prejean is going 15, 20 miles over the limit, following the familiar route from Baton Rouge to Angola, on her way to visit a young man at the Louisiana State Penitentiary who received a death sentence a few years ago for stabbing a woman and leaving her to bleed to death. Sister Prejean has turned off the Interstate and is now cruising down Highway 66, the road that ends at Angola. All the other cars have disappeared, and when the first exit points toward a place called Solitude the name seems less descriptive than unimaginative. The prison is miles beyond Solitude.

The inmate Sister Prejean is driving to see is a slight black man in his mid-20's whose hands and legs are bowed by rheumatoid arthritis. The nun is his spiritual adviser. She visits every month or so, and they sit in a concrete room on opposite sides of a wire grate and talk about everything, it seems, except death. The conversation is fitful and awkward. Mainly, it is small talk — Sister Prejean brings him candy and soda and wonders if there are other items in the vending machine he would like better. She tries to draw him out, but can't. It's not that he's lethargic, it's that he is painfully inarticulate. He is most animated while discussing his case. Apparently there is no physical evidence linking him to the crime, and he is hoping to win a new trial. Like his neighbors on death row, he spends his time monitoring the progress of his appeal. For most it is just stalling the inevitable; since 1976, when the death penalty was reinstated,

CITIBANK'S NEW STOCK INDEX INSURED ACCOUNT

Stock market returns. Zero risk to principal.

TRANSFER OR ROLLOVER YOUR IRA OR KEOGH TO CITIBANK'S NEW FDIC INSURED ACCOUNT.

If you want to make the most of your retirement plan, move your IRA or Keogh to Citibank now. Why? Because Citibank's new Stock Index Insured Account gives you the potential for stock market growth, without risk to principal.

EXCLUSIVELY FOR IRAs AND KEOGHS

CITIBANK'S NEW STOCK INDEX INSURED ACCOUNT.

With this unique account, your IRA or Keogh deposit actually earns two times the average percentage increase in the Standard & Poor's 500 Index over a five year term. Yet it's 100% safe. There's no risk of losing your principal...even if the market goes down. Your principal is FDIC insured.

HERE'S HOW IT WORKS.

The Stock Index Insured Account is a five year deposit. So it's the perfect way to let your IRA or Keogh money take advantage of long-term market trends. The return for this account is calculated by averaging the month-end values of the S&P 500 Index over the term, comparing this average to the Index on the day your account was opened, and doubling the percentage gain. So in a rising market, you enjoy stock market growth.

But even in a declining market, your principal is safe.

1-800-321-CITI

The Stock Index Insured Account is only available at Citibank. And unlike investments with a broker or in some mutual funds, there are no management fees or sales charges. And there's no risk to principal. The minimum deposit is only $10,000.

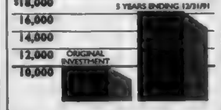
Because the return is based on stock market movement over a full five years, there are severe penalties for early withdrawal.

HERE'S HOW TO START:

For more information, or to rollover or transfer your IRA or Keogh, stop into any Citibank branch today or call 1-800-321-CITI, ext. 7102.

You can call any day of the week, even on weekends.

TOTAL RETURN ON FIVE-YEAR DEPOSIT HELD UNTIL MATURITY.



If you had deposited $10,000 on 12/31/86 and held it until 12/31/91 your total return would be $16,332. (Original investment plus $6,332 interest). Because your return is based on the average of the month-end values of the S&P 500 Index over the five-year term, you would have received a return even though this period included the 1987 market downturn.

THE CITI NEVER SLEEPS®

Opening deposits must be received for this account by the last business day on or before the 25th of the month. Deposits received earlier in the month are placed in an interest bearing account. Accounts will be opened on the last business day of each month. Maximum investment is $5 million per customer. Account availability may be suspended at any time without notice. TAKE THE MONEY AND RUN

A Rogues' Gallery of Some Lucky S.& L. Thieves

BY STEPHEN P. PIZZO AND PAUL MUOLO

DOES CRIME PAY? FOR THE white-collar criminals who played leading roles in the savings and loan debacle, the answer appears to be a resounding yes. A handful of high-profile figures have received stiff sentences, notably Charles H. Keating Jr., who may spend the rest of his life behind bars for selling worthless junk bonds to depositors of Lincoln Savings and Loan Association and stealing tens of millions of dollars from Lincoln's federally insured deposits. But many have gone unpunished, and most of those who have faced prosecution were handed short sentences or probation. Even their court-imposed criminal fines and financial restitution remain largely uncollected.

Recent studies of bank fraud prosecutions by the General Accounting Office and Public Citizen's Congress Watch have come to basically the same conclusion: Crime — at least bank fraud — pays.

Among the findings: from 1987 through 1992 Federal bank and thrift regulators filed a staggering 95,045 criminal referrals with the F.B.I. The volume was so large that more than 75 percent of these referrals have been dropped without prosecution. Those convicted of bank fraud have been sentenced to prison terms that averaged 2.4 years, compared with 7.8 years for those convicted of old-fashioned bank robbery. From October 1988 through June 1992 Federal courts ordered defendants to repay more than $846.7 million in fines and restitution, of which the Government has collected only 4.5 percent.

In cases where the defendant agreed to pay restitution in return for a reduction in the prison sentence the collection rate is even worse. The courts were promised $133.8 million in return for leniency, but have collected only $577,540 — or less than half a cent on the dollar.

The issues raised by these statistics go deeper than a petty need to extract satisfaction for taxpayers. They also collide with the stated values of a judicial system that seems to have boundless energy and resources to fight and punish so-called street crimes but comes up short when confronted with multimillion-dollar white-collar crimes.

Faced with this discrepancy, Congress imposed a set of new sentencing guidelines in 1987 that mandated minimum sentences over which judges had little discretion. But this measure did little to narrow the gap between street crime and white-collar crime. Those who committed sophisticated financial frauds continued to get off lightly. The courts simply view such crimes differently.

After a jury convicted Thomas E. Nevis, a developer in Yuba City, Calif., of defrauding an Oregon S.& L. out of $55 million, the Federal judge, Owen Panner, ultimately reduced Nevis's sentence to six months in a halfway house and $2 million in restitution. When the prosecutor raised objections, the judge explained his reasoning: "This man has a unique ability, and I think it can be carried out honestly as well as dishonestly. . . . People who are able to accomplish what he has, if it can be done honestly, are also stimulating the economy of this country and helping those of us who are professionals to exist."

Consequently prosecutors now think twice before filing charges in such cases. Either they limit the number of charges, knowing that wealthy fraud defendants will use every means available to elude a mandatory prison term; or they bring stiff charges initially only to use them as a plea-bargaining tool, reducing them to a single, lesser charge if the defendant agrees to plead guilty.

Why aren't white-collar criminals prosecuted more zealously? Being tough on street crime is always popular because the public feels threatened by violent crime and wants violent criminals out of circulation. But prosecutors get little political mileage out of prosecuting white-collar crimes because the public simply does not feel threatened by men like Michael Milken and Charles Keating.

"Look, I can wave a pair of bloody underwear in front of a jury and have their undivided attention," one Federal prosecutor said. "But I can wave $100 million in phony loan statements in front of the same jury and just watch their eyes glaze over."

Bruce J. Maffeo, a former prosecutor with the Brooklyn Organized Crime Strike Force, echoed the complaint. "Even in a small bank fraud case the paper trail is just awesome," he said. "It's just really hard to get the Government cranked up on one of these cases."

The lack of judicial vigor has been an unexpected bonus for some of the most notorious figures in the S.& L. debacle. Herewith a few who got off lightly:

From Amsterdam to Amsterdam Avenue (give or take a mile), the saga of a Mother's Day bouquet.

NOTHING SMELLS SWEETER than Mother's Day if you grow, buy or sell flowers for a living. Not even Valentine's Day comes close. Ever since Anna Jarvis organized the first Mother's Day memorial service on May 10, 1908, at the Andrews Methodist Church in Grafton, W.Va., and gave each attendee a carnation, her late mother's favorite bloom, the event has been a blessing for the flower industry. President Wilson proclaimed Mother's Day a national sentiment in 1914, and it soon found itself on calendars in other lands, complete with the floral accent. Each year the flower powers in the United States, Germany, Belgium and the Netherlands try to devise new ways

Louisiana has had one of the busiest death chambers in the country. In 1987 alone, eight men were executed in less than nine weeks. This is the fifth death-row inmate Sister Prejean has befriended. Three were electrocuted.

It is just after 4 the next morning when Sister Prejean walks out of the darkness into the perpetual light of the Eucharistic Adoration Chapel in St. Martinville, La., and embraces the lone parishioner, a man who calls her "darlin.' " His name is Lloyd LeBlanc, and he prays here every Friday at this hour, which is his hour, in perpetuity. The nun has driven down from Baton Rouge and across the Acadian swampland to be with him this morning, as she does every other month.

"How old would David be this year?" she asks as they kneel, side by side, before the monstrance.

"David would be 33, Sister," the man says, fingering his rosary.

Outside, cut in stone on the memorial, is the name David LeBlanc. He was murdered in 1977, face down in the dirt, next to his girlfriend, who was raped before being shot in the head. Her name is here, too, above his. Loretta Ann Bourque, 18 years old.

The scripture today is from Exodus 21. It includes the words: "He that smiteth a man, so that he die, shall be surely put to death." It is sadly, uncannily fitting. The first time Lloyd LeBlanc met Helen Prejean was in 1984 at a meeting of the Louisiana Pardon Board. As the representative of his family and Loretta Bourque's, LeBlanc, writes Sister Prejean, was asking the board "to uphold the death sentence" of Elmo Patrick Sonnier, one of two brothers convicted of the murders. Helen Prejean, who was Patrick Sonnier's spiritual adviser and closest friend, as well as the director of Pilgrimage for Life, a Louisiana anti-death-penalty group, was arguing the other side. Three days later the two met again, just after midnight, in the witness room of the death chamber at the Louisiana State Penitentiary and watched as 1,900 volts of electricity were channeled through Patrick Sonnier's body, and smoke rose off his left leg, and he convulsed, and was pronounced dead.

"Sister, I love you," Lloyd LeBlanc tells the nun today after morning prayers, as they sit down to a sumptuous breakfast prepared by Lloyd's wife, Eula. "But there's a sore spot in me still." The rub is not, he explains, that Sister Prejean spent more than two years ministering to the man who killed his son. That he understands. He himself had knelt in the field beside his slain son and prayed the Our Father and meant the part about forgiveness. But those words isolated him. Almost everyone else wanted vengeance, and somehow he was pressed to implore the state to take Patrick Sonnier's life. If only the nun had come to see him, too. That is what he is angry about, that in all the years Sister Prejean was visiting Sonnier, she never once reached out to him. "I guess you figured I wasn't in prison," he says.

"That's what I've got to live with," says the nun later. "That I didn't do that. Nothing I do now will make up for that."

Still, she is trying. When Helen Prejean realized that her failure to take account of those left behind by the men she befriended on death row served to compound their loss, she started to visit them, too. These visits were harder; they required courage, not just conviction, and at first she wasn't sure she had it. "When are you going to come and visit us," she remembers being asked by Vernon Harvey, whose stepdaughter, Faith Hathaway, was killed by Robert Lee Willie, one of Sister Prejean's death-row friends. At the time, Harvey and Prejean were standing on the steps of the Louisiana State Capitol, he with his pro-death-penalty posters, she with her abolitionist banners, and it hadn't occurred to her that she had anything but more pain to offer him and his wife, Elizabeth. Sister Prejean did go to see the Harveys, and it was then, sitting in their suburban New Orleans living room, where the shades were drawn and the ashtrays were filled to overflowing, that she began to understand that her work was not only about politics, not simply a matter of taking sides — that it was not about being for Robert Lee Willie and against the Harveys, or for the Harveys and against Willie. The men on death row and the people whose lives they had shattered, she came to see, had more in common with each other than with the rest of us. Spending time with the Harveys and the LeBlancs and other families of crime victims, listening to their stories, holding their hands, weeping with them, helping to found a support group for them called Survive, was a natural extension of her prison ministry.

"Of course she tries to be friends with the victims' families, she probably feels guilty as hell," says William Alford, the lawyer who, as an assistant district attorney, prosecuted Robert Lee Willie and pressed for his death sentence. Alford is still furious at Sister Prejean for her conduct during Willie's execution, when she said a prayer out loud in the witness room that began, "God forgive us, forgive all who participate in this execution."

"Instead of praying for the poor S.O.B. who was about to die, she thought it was her duty to put a guilt trip on the families, on me, on the law-enforcement officers. The witness room is no place for causes. She should have been outside on a picket line."

While the nun objects to this point of view, she does not wholly dismiss Alford's assessment of her emotions. "I do have guilt toward these families, knowing I'm befriending the person who killed their child," she says. "But I don't feel guilty for having compassion for people who are condemned to death for killing other people.

"The truth is, most of the families reject me. I get letters saying, 'You stupid native nun, you don't know what we've been through.' And they're right. I don't."

Helen Prejean did not intend to work with death-row inmates any more than she expected to work with victims' families or become, at 53, a book writer. What she did plan to do was become a nun, and live in a convent, and teach in a Catholic girls' school. She was attending such a school in the mid-1950's when she told her father, a Baton Rouge lawyer, and her mother, a nurse, that she wanted to enter the convent. It was a decision, she says, that seemed to make itself. "I always sensed I was going to be generous with God, to give my life to God," she recalls. "I never saw myself marrying one man and having one family." She entered the novitiate of Sisters of St. Joseph of Medaille in 1957.

That might have been the secular end of Helen Prejean, but Vatican II intervened and became for her, as for millions of other Catholics, the defining event of her life. She gave up the name Sister Louis Augustine, which she had taken upon entering the convent, and stopped wearing a habit — superficial changes that, much later, led to other, tectonic shifts. "I was 40 years old before I got the connection between preaching the gospel and living the gospel," Sister Prejean says. It was 1980. A nun who was also a sociologist was speaking to the sisters, preaching a domestic liberation theology, urging them to go out and work with the poor. Listening to her, Sister Prejean had what can only be described as a conversion experience. Until then, she had believed that the proper role of the nun involved a life of service to the Church. Afterward, she understood that a relationship with God, through a life among the poor and dispossessed, was a kind of prayer. "The important thing," she says now, "is that when you come to understand something you act on it, no matter how small that act is. Eventually it will take you where you need to go."

Her destination, it turned out, was a moldering, expansive housing project called St. Thomas that sits between the east bank of the Mississippi and one of New Orleans's most elegant neighborhoods, the Garden District. Sister Prejean lived in an apartment in St. Thomas with four other nuns and worked at Hope House, a private, nonprofit social service agency that served the St. Thomas community, offering adult-education classes, recreational programs, a food pantry and homeless shelter. Sister Prejean, who had begun her vocation teaching English to the children of the Catholic elite, continued to teach, but at Hope House her students were poor black men and women, some of whom had not yet learned to read. "At first I tried to be as poor as the people at St. Thomas," she says. "But then I realized that no matter how much money I didn't have, I was never going to be as poor as they are. I have all the resources. I can read. I have punctuation. I can call up judges and they will talk to me."

IT WAS AT HOPE House that Sister Prejean was asked by someone who worked at a prison rights organization if she would correspond with a man on death row at the Louisiana State Penitentiary. Elmo Patrick Sonnier's was the name she was given. He was a white man from St. Martinville Parish, a Cajun, who with his brother Eddie had raped and killed Loretta Bourque and brutally murdered David LeBlanc. Sister Prejean began tentatively — what was there to say? — sending a photograph of herself and a picture of Christ on the cross and a short, breezy letter telling him who she was. She signed her name "Sister Helen." "I wanted him to understand that I would be sister to him," she says. "The man had been in the desert for five years without a drink of water. The possibility of death-row inmates falling in love with you is great."

But what about her? Hadn't she, by her vow of celibacy, been in the desert far longer than he? "There are instances when women are attracted to death-row inmates. It's not a healthy thing. I'm not unconsciously moving toward these inmates because I need intimacy from them. I already have close, intimate friends," she says, knowing that it is an argument she sounds defensive making. "I did love Pat Sonnier — as a brother."

After Sonnier got her first letter he wrote back, worried that because she was a nun, their correspondence would have to be scriptural. She assured him they could just "talk regular." He wrote to her about living in a cell, 6 feet wide and 8 feet long, about using his foot locker as if it were a bench press, about the lousy prison food. After a while Sister Prejean felt it was not enough to write to this man, so she started to visit. And then that was not enough, either. There was something unseemly about it, as if by easing his transition from life to death she were sanctioning his execution. As C. Paul Phelps, then a warden at Angola, put it: "The person who makes the execution go smoothly is the religious adviser. Without them the inmate would have to be dragged kicking and fighting. They do yeoman work." But this was not the kind of yeoman Sister Prejean wanted to be. And so she helped found Pilgrimage for Life, to work for the abolition of the death penalty in Louisiana. "What I do comes out of my involvement with individual people. It is not abstract. The people I first met at St. Thomas were poor and trapped, and it seemed to me that I had three choices: walk away; be kind to the individual and do nothing about the system; be kind to the individual and try to change the system. The same choices confronted me when I went to death row." Speaking from the platform of Pilgrimage for Life, she found that her classroom was suddenly much, much larger.

"In the beginning some of the sisters were saying, 'What in the world is Helen doing with those murderers?' " Sister Prejean says. But soon other nuns in the order, which has houses in Louisiana, Ohio and Minnesota, followed her lead; even its president, Sister Julie Sheatzley, who lives in Cincinnati, corresponds with a man on death row at Angola. In 1990 the entire 216-member community voted to take a corporate stand against the death penalty. "We cannot uphold a practice which permanently banishes some of our members from the human family by killing them," it says in part. "As followers of Jesus Christ we reaffirm his way of compassion which calls us to overcome hatred with love, to meet evil with goodness, and to forgive rather than avenge ourselves on those who harm us."

> Sister Prejean argues that people are more than the worst thing they have ever done in their life.

For Sister Prejean, who was its principal author, the corporate stand taken by her community was not only an endorsement of the work she was doing, but also an incentive to find ways to expand her social ministry. "If the order had been pulling my energy away, I would have had to leave," Sister Prejean says. Instead, the community supported her, emotionally and financially. At Hope House she was earning about $3,000 a year, not enough to cover her living costs. Her book advance for "Dead Man Walking: An Eyewitness Account of the Death Penalty in the United States" (out next month from Random House) was in the neighborhood of $20,000, yet, paid out over three years, still fell short of paying her way. The nun is painfully aware that she has not pulled her financial weight for a decade, and that the community, because it is aging, will not be able to keep her going indefinitely. Though she will see none of the money from her book, she knows that if it does well it could be decisive both for her and for the women who have supported her all these years. "I hope the community makes a big hunk of money on this book," she says bluntly. She talks about a possible movie deal or the direct-mail sales campaign she is organizing with earnest and naïve enthusiasm. The real bottom line, though, is never out of sight. "I want the book to be a bridge between the poor and nonpoor," she says. And then, as if this is too abstract: "I am hoping that when people of good will read it, they won't allow the death penalty to continue."

WHAT DISTINGUISHES "Dead Man Walking" from other books about the death penalty is Sister Prejean's honest and deliberate rendering of the men on death row. Its power comes as much from the relentless pace of her narrative as it does from the undistorted portraits she draws of the men whose deaths have been scheduled by the state. She doesn't suppose their innocence, doesn't appeal to the possibility that somehow they are there by mistake. She embraces their guilt, and from that embrace argues that "people are more than the worst thing they have ever done in their life." But because she doesn't flinch in the face of their crimes, Sister Prejean understands that there is some chance that people of good will might also come away from her book unconvinced of the grievousness of the death penalty — understands, but can't quite believe it. Even some of the victims' families have come out against the death penalty. (Not the Harveys, though. "I changed you more than you changed me," Vernon Harvey likes to tease her, and she has to admit that he is right.)

Upstairs at Hope House, where Pilgrimage for Life has its office, Sister Prejean is telling Michael Sintef and Katy Quigley, the new directors, about her most recent visit to the prison at Angola. The death chamber, where Robert Lee Willie and Patrick Sonnier were electrocuted, has been whitewashed and renovated, the electric chair removed to a museum in New Orleans. Gone, too, is the fan that sucked the smell of burning flesh out of the room. Until this year, execution at Angola meant death by electrocution. From now on it will be by lethal injection. In the middle of the room, bolted to the floor, is a custom-made padded gurney in the shape of a cross, and a white curtain that can be drawn around it, as if the gurney were a hospital bed. Despite this pretense, the death chamber looks less like a hospital room than a laboratory — which is what it is, really, since no one in Louisiana is practiced in this par-their language.) To stay awake throughout the morning, they cloud the air with cigarette smoke and down endless cups of vending-machine coffee. They have received overnight faxes from regular customers for hard orders. Some may also want to speculate, for themselves or for a client, by buying extra quantities because of a foreseen price rise or because bargain lots prove irresistible. Speculation is dangerous, however, with articles that can be worthless after a few days.

Buyers with cellular phones and printouts on their desks focus on the computerized clocks at the front of the room. The face of each clock — 13 in all in five rooms — gives information on producer, product, unit of currency (divisions or multiples of a Dutch guilder), comments on quality and minimum purchase necessary. The buyers have earlier checked out the flowers in the collection area and noted the number of the lot and the room where it will be auctioned. There is a rose room with two clocks: one for sweetheart, another for large-blooming roses. Another room sells nothing but tulips. Simultaneously, all of the clocks may be registering bids on a single tub or several carts of Pavarotti Roses, Aladdin Tulips, cymbidium orchids, ranunculus, Aurora Freesia, calla lilies, Bianca Alstroemeria, statice, gypsophila, rubber plants and coconuts.

Bidding in the Dutch auction system, unique in the world, works backward, from high to low. A buyer watches the flashing lights on the rim of the clocks as they run from 100 to 1. As the flowers enter the auction room, young assistants point to the lot being bid on. The buyer presses a button when the clock light comes to a price he is willing to pay. Whoever hits the button first, accepting the highest price, wins the lot; a transaction is completed about every four seconds on each clock. Bidding continues until all the lots have been sold, around 12:30 P.M., during the two weeks before Mother's Day. The atmosphere is unfrenzied and low key, the stop-and-go creaking of the tow chain interrupted by the murmur of the auctioneers' voices and a clicking of buttons. Once out the doors of the auction rooms, each lot of flowers is tagged with a computer printout of the sale and distributed to the buyer's areas in the complex for shipping, with 85 to 90 percent of a day's purchases going out within 24 hours. (Giant companies like S. Zurel have their own fleet of trucks.) From 10 A.M. until about 3 P.M., the buyer's employees rush to fill orders. Bouquets are collected for sale in the streets of Amsterdam that afternoon while boxes are prepared and stacked into pallets for air transport to wholesalers in other countries.

More than 80 percent of the flowers go to 20 percent of the buyers. To participate at auction a company needs plenty of capital; buyers have to pay the co-op in full at the end of every auction day — there is no credit. The average daily profit runs from 10 to 20 percent, with the Dutch Government taking 45 to 48 percent of that in taxes. Mergers disguise a high rate of failures. Growers are paid once a week by the co-op and pay a small amount (5 to 6 percent) of a year's profits for operations.

Exporters have distinct territories. Adriaan Barendsen, a third-generation flower businessman, is co-owner of Gebr. (Brothers) Barendsen, which sells primarily to Scandinavia, Switzerland and the Middle East. Like an international diplomat, he learned Norwegian and Swedish to foster his business. (Required to study four languages in school, the Dutch grow up to be advantaged traders.)

"We're between the 25th and 30th biggest buyer of cut flowers here at the auction," Barendsen says, answering a constantly ringing phone in offices that have computers on every desk. "And we're expanding. I took over what had been a hobby for my father and made it into a business." Last year Gebr. Barendsen, with 35 employees, did about $22 million in sales.

The packing areas are male-dominated, like the rest of the Dutch flower business; women wrap or wash flowers or take phone orders. But the pinup posters that surround them feature touches of commercial pride: The women in wet T-shirts astride Harley-Davidson motorcycles have daisies and chrysanthemums cascading from the handlebars.

Before flowers will be admitted to the United States, every grain of soil must be washed off. Exporters can pay extra at auction for washed tulips or do the job themselves. (The fastidious Japanese have their own inspectors at the site.) The KLM Flight 643 to New York leaves at 7:10 P.M. from Schiphol Airport, a 15-minute drive from Aalsmeer, but the pallets must arrive one and a half hours before departure. Inside the buyer's storage lockers, some set at about 35 degrees Fahrenheit for roses, the flowers are blasted with cold air until the minute they leave to catch their flight.

Arriving at Kennedy Airport, eight hours later, around 9:10 P.M. local time, freight from KLM 643 is unloaded and broken down by the airline. Paper work for each shipment of flowers has been cleared for customs and undergoes inspection by the Department of Agriculture's P.P.Q. (Plant Protection and Quarantine) officers. If soil, insects or disease are found, they can force the shipment to be sent back, treated or destroyed. (For this reason, only cut flowers are imported from Aalsmeer to the United States). The importer picks up the bill for air freight, plant inspections and the 8.1 percent duty.

"Freight costs ultimately determine the price of the product," says Jon Lloyd of Florimex, an importer with offices in seven North American cities. "If you can realize a 15 percent profit on each shipment, you feel like a champ."

An importer might not get its flowers until after midnight. Whatever has been presold is shipped out immediately by truck or plane. The rest is stored at warehouses near the airport. After all the orders have gone out, Florimex checks inventory and at 6:30 A.M. the name, price and quantity of the remaining flowers are posted on the sales board. An hour later they start selling to their network of over 170 wholesalers around the country. The process of checking results from the auctions, calling customers and reordering from the export companies goes on all day.

THE WHOLESALERS ON West 28th Street in Manhattan, the flower district for the city, have their purchases delivered from the importers as early as 3:30 A.M. Usually they buy far more than their guaranteed sales, because more than half of their trade depends on daily foot traffic. Retail florists from Pennsylvania and Connecticut as well as New Jersey and New York stroll from store to store, checking price and quality as the sun rises along the street.

"The bulk of our business is done the old-fashioned way," says Jeffrey Serafini of S.& G. Wholesale Florists. "We put it out. They see it and touch it and decide whether or not to buy it." (A wholesaler's profits run about 20 percent; retail florists, the most likely to be stuck with wilted flowers mark up at 100 percent.) By 11 A.M., wholesalers usually can tell whether there will be enough business to stay open until 2 P.M., the usual closing time. Forty-eight hours after the scissored quietus in the greenhouse, the rose completes its jet-lagged journey.

The arranged vases of variegated blossoms that appear in the lobbies of posh New York hotels or the rubber-banded fistfuls of tulips outside Korean groceries throughout the city can come from a number of places: California, Florida, South America and in the summer months, New Jersey and Long Island. Flowers from Holland, however, remain a constant; Aalsmeer may be the only place that can supply the numbers and quality needed for an elaborate wedding or a gala social event.

Flowers from Aalsmeer or from the other Dutch auctions are reputed to be the finest, and their selection is undoubtedly the widest, but Americans buy only half as many cut flowers as the Japanese and Italians, a third as many as the Swiss. In fact, less than 5 percent of the co-op's business is now conducted with the United States. A weak dollar and rising freight costs brought about a decline from a peak of 12 percent in the early 80's. The reopening of markets in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union has the Dutch growers and buyers in an upbeat mood; an extra 100,000 square meters of space will be added by October.

Mother's Day is a spike on the American charts. Marketing the enjoyment of spring with the even more cunning tactic of guilt, the flower industry has made a profitable shrine of motherhood. The upsurge of 800 numbers and prefab bouquets has eased the problem of children who have moved far away from home. But in the markets along Manhattan's streets, on a day when the bounty and choices of a metropolis are brilliantly apparent, dutiful sons and daughters (and husbands) look and sniff and feel, choosing their gifts the old-fashioned way. ■ to put bouquets in the hands of every mother's son and daughter on the second Sunday in May.

Crucial to the delivery of these bright offerings is a group of Dutch men (and a few women) who gather five days a week in a building 10 miles outside of Amsterdam. The Verenigde Bloemenveilingen Aalsmeer, a cooperative of about 5,000 growers, is the Wall Street of the flower business, the largest auction of its kind in the world. From as far away as Zimbabwe, Colombia, Israel and Thailand, and throughout Europe, products are shipped to Aalsmeer for assessment by its 2,500 buyers and delivery around the globe by some 400 export companies. Last year, more than 800 kinds of cut flowers and plants, bringing more than $1.8 billion, passed through its doors.

The product of a merger in 1968 between two auction firms that had been selling these items since 1912, the co-op is a small city as much as a marketplace. Spread across the equivalent of 100 football fields, housing four banks, a 40-member police force, a fire department, its own power plant, truck and bicycle and computer repair shops, it is the largest commercial building in the world, rivaling the Pentagon in scale. Many exporters have their own box, packing paper, string and label companies on the perimeter. The only obvious absence is a retail florist. It is nearly impossible for either employees or tourists to buy flowers at the complex.

The operation of growing, packing on and shipping flowers in the Netherlands is a model of automated efficiency. Months before Mother's Day, computers in the greenhouses have calculated the amount of light and nutrients to give the plants so that tight blossoms will appear in the first two weeks of May. A rosebush may bud seven times a year and never feel the soil during its five-to-seven-year life span. Syringes inject water and food into a base of clay pebbles or sponge to nurture the stalks. As the nurseries have bred roses for color, in response to consumer preference, qualities like odor have been depressed or lost. (The need to restore fragrance is the subject of much botanical experimentation at the moment.)

Cutting is still done by hand, in the Netherlands often by Turkish women or other imported labor, and ideally in the afternoon before the next day's auctions. To relieve the humid and speechless boredom of harvesting in a greenhouse, many growers blast Euro-rock from speakers mounted along the rows. Wooden shoes and heavy socks are favorite footwear in winter months.

Machines then take over. In the case of roses, sometimes as many as 200 varieties, a conveyor belt equipped with an electric eye sorts the stems according to length. Gathered and labeled for quality, they are put in water inside uniform plastic tubs bought from the co-op. For other flowers, like gerberas, special boxes with rows of notched holes to protect the heads have been designed for shipping from greenhouse through the auctions to final destinations.

The plants arrive at a cold-storage area during the night. Beginning at about 4:30 A.M. they are hauled into the collection hall and assembled by variety on uniform carts ("stapelwagens"), which can hold as many as 27 small tubs on three shelves. After inspectors have checked the quality of the flowers against the grower's label, each lot is assigned a number; the carts are then slotted into a tow chain ("kettingbaan") that carries them through one of the four auction rooms for cut flowers. (There is another room for potted plants.)

Only the faintest scent of what is being sold wafts up to the catwalks above the floor, where acres of flowers are processed every working day. To protect fragile entities that are, after all, technically dead, the building is kept dim and chilly. Heating pipes that run along the steel-girdered ceilings can be turned on at the threat of a freeze; windowless darkness inside and the Dutch weather provide natural air-conditioning. Those who haul around the plants can keep warm by walking as much as 10 miles a day. But most internal transport is done by electric tractors or on fleets of bicycles. Windbreakers and running shoes are standard gear.

THE AUCTIONS BEGIN at 6:30 A.M. in brightly lighted white rooms at the center of the building. The tiers of blond bentwood seats can accommodate as many as 500 buyers, virtually all of them young-to-middle-aged Dutch men. (Business is conducted entirely in

PARIS REPORT

WHAT A STEW PARIS HAS COOKED UP FOR fall! Loosely held together by that heady froth of broth, the ephemeral Paris fashion spirit, there are enough disparate ideas to stock the biggest pot-au-feu. At the base are the familiar meat-and-potato styles of such names as Saint Laurent, Dior, Ungaro, Givenchy, Rykiel and Lacroix. They know their métier and we know their product. No surprises here. What makes this season's stew so tantalizing are the spicy ideas that conjure up romantic allusions, the sharp garnishes of silhouette, the odd combinations of ingredients like velvet and knit used together and even the raw gizzards of experimental design. This is not going to be a season for the woman who likes her fashion recipe neat and simple. But it will be gobbled up by those who love to dig into the mix.

First of all there is the mix itself. One of the strongest movements in Paris was the idea of assembling unexpected combinations of fabrics in one outfit. This was done with the most sprightly attitude by the terrific new talent Lamine Kouyaté for his company, Xuly-Bët; in a refreshing and thoroughly wearable way by Dries van Noten; in an intellectual mode by Rei Kawakubo for Comme des Garçons, and in a brilliantly commercial manner by Karl Lagerfeld for Chanel. Thanks to Lagerfeld some of the most chic women in the world may well be walking around next fall wearing oversized white shirts with tails sticking out and cuffs dangling over their hands. These will be under nipped and shortened Chanel tweed jackets scattered with sequins, and accessorized with long velvet ribbons knotted like men's neckties mixed with gilded biker chains. Their tights will be tucked into sneaker like booties emblazoned with Chanel's double C's.

Should all this seem too much, there was also a strong move to minimalism. Yohji Yamamoto did it in a fluid, sculptural way; Hervé Léger with the maximum amount of sexiness, the House of Balenciaga with the starkest simplicity. But it was Karl Lagerfeld for his own label who melded minimalism with a molded attenuated silhouette that smoldered with sophistication.

The urge for romanticism, redolent of Bloomsbury or Edwardian England, was the spice of the collections. Romeo Gigli's pants suits for women made one think of the movie "Howards End," and there was a sense of Virginia Woolf's attire about the clothes at Chloé, another Karl Lagerfeld production. The sporty approach was found at Claude Montana in his ski goddess designs and at Issey Miyake whose usual unusual fabrics were cut into jackets resembling those from L. L. Bean.

In this atmosphere, even the experimental deconstructionist Martin Margiela seemed normal. It's just part of the Paris stew. ■ ing republic status. (Of the six republics of the old Yugoslavia, Serbia was the only one to have two provinces: Vojvodina and Kosovo.) They did not get it, but Tito gave the province a university, language rights, its own court system, its own police force and an independent vote in the Federal Presidency. Throughout the 1980's, Serbia discovered that its own Jerusalem could be counted on to vote against it on almost every issue.

Worse, Serbs were leaving Kosovo in a steady stream. They told stories of harassment by the Albanians and of the impossibility of redress in the Albanian-run courts. By 1987, the Serbs remaining in Kosovo made up only 10 percent of the population. They were frightened. They carried guns when they went out to work in their fields. They petitioned the Federal Parliament but got nowhere. They were persecuted anew by Communist leaders who were terrified of facing the growing unhappiness among all Serbs. And so the dream of Kosovo came back as a nightmare.

In April 1987, at a hearing of Serb grievances, one of the faceless gray Communists stepped forward and startled everyone by breaking the code of silence on nationalist issues and publicly pledging his support for the Serbs' cause. Any Serb can recite the opening lines of his speech: "You must stay here. Your land is here. Here are your houses, your fields and gardens, your memories."

His name was Slobodan Milosevic.

Serbian police inspecting the contents of a car belonging to ethnic Albanians stopped at a checkpoint in Pristina.

ON THE DRIVE back to Pristina, Gazmend mentioned that many Albanian doctors had been fired. Albanians were afraid to go to Serb doctors who, like the policemen, were being rotated down from other parts of Serbia. So an underground network of clinics had been organized. That was how everything was working now. The Albanians had organized a shadow society. Few people still had jobs, so services and goods were bartered and often simply given.

"It took the Serbs to teach us how to be true Communists," Gazmend said, laughing.

And passive resisters. And nationalists. Blood feuds ran deep among Albanians, but recently more than 1,000 feuds between families, many going back generations, had been patched up; the Albanians had to present a solid front if they were going to resist the Serbs. In other words, the Serbs accomplished what Albanian nationalists had never been able to do: force the fractious Albanians to place a strong Albanian national consciousness above traditional clannishness.

In Pristina, we shared a beer on the terrace of my hotel with a man named Shaqir, who had been arrested for his part in mass demonstrations in 1981 calling, again, for republic status for Kosovo. Every few minutes, a fighter jet buzzed the city, the hoarse scream of its engines blotting out conversation.

"Since 1981," Shaqir was saying in low tones, in English, "100 Albanian civilians have been killed by the police. Most were shot in the back. From 1981 to 1989, 7,000 people have been sentenced to 20,840 years in prison. If you say 'Kosovo republic,' you get two months. If you order Kosovo riesling in a bar by saying K.R., you get two months."

As for Shaqir himself, the police had broken down his front door in 1981 and put him in solitary for two months, then released him and then imprisoned him again for two years.

"Did they torture you?" I asked. I never liked to ask this, but I always had to. No one ever volunteered the information. "If you don't want to talk about it — "

"No, why not?" He shrugged. "People should know." But then he paused, and in the long seconds of that pause an expression that I had seen many times before slowly spread across his face. So many people in Yugoslavia had been tortured at one time or another, and every one I had met — Serb, Croat, Muslim, Albanian — had been seized with the same expression. The face set slowly, like a pudding congealing, and a flush rose and the eyes went through an extraordinary transformation, locking onto yours and deepening and turning inward, trancelike, as tears welled up around the edges of a brutal clamping down of the will. It was a terribly intimate look, a defenseless, childlike look. Perhaps this was how you looked at your torturer as he scanned your face to see how you would respond to . . . this.

"They beat you every day," Shaqir said quietly. "They beat you until they are afraid you will die if they beat you more. So they send you to the hospital and fix you up and send you back so they can beat you again." He started to say something else, but stopped. "I'm sorry. To talk about it is to remember."

About life after prison, he could talk more or less matter-of-factly. "I had a wife and two children, but you have a choice. You can live with them and bring them trouble, violence at school. Or if you love them, you leave, so they can get work, lead some sort of normal life. So I divorced my wife."

"To say the Serbs are fascists is an insult to fascism!" Gazmend's friend burst out loudly.

We happened to be surrounded by Serbs in police blue and army olive green. Their beers glowed, their bullets shone, their pistols bulged, their walkie-talkies made eerie robotic burbles.

"Come now," Gazmend demurred. "Really, he's joking."

"I am not!"

"Have you seen Gracanica?" Gazmend said, changing the subject. Gracanica was a Serbian monastery outside Pristina.

"I have."

"It's a beautiful building."

"It is indeed."

On the monastery's famous frescoes, the eyes of the sainted Serbian King Milutin and Queen Simonida had been gouged out. The Serbs said Albanian vandals had done it. Albanians said Serb peasants had done it, out of a folk belief that plaster rubbed from a saint's eyes could be applied to your own to cure various ocular ailments.

One of the policemen was roaring drunk. He was waving his pistol and shouting, a short man, challenging all comers. Two of his colleagues were trying to calm him down. My eyes were glued to the pistol. I quailed each time the barrel foreshortened to a black hole. The hotel's stereo system was pounding out a Serbian national song. On the street under the lindens, a line of crouching Gypsy boys polished the shoes of policemen and soldiers, swinging their brushes in time with the music.

IN THE SHADE OF THE fountain of the Sultan Murad mosque, I met Jakub, a burly man with hazel eyes and white hair wound in tight curls. He introduced me to his young son, Durim, who was transfixed by my beard. (In Kosovo, a beard meant you were a Chetnik, a Serb nationalist.) We had been talking for only a moment when another man hurried over to us and spoke anxiously with Jakub in Albanian.

"He heard you speaking Serbian," Jakub explained to me. "He thought you had come to poison the fountain."

The man apologized profusely to me for thinking I was a Serb.

Jakub showed me proudly around the mosque, its whitewashed dome painted with a great crimson wheel of arabesques drooping teardrop spokes like a firework. Then we went to a teahouse, where the tea was served with lemon wedges in plain glasses you had to hold gingerly by the rim. It was so strong it made my teeth squeak.

The Serb and Albanian communities were so antagonistic now, so fearful of each other, that no Serb would dream of going into an Albanian teahouse unless it was to order everybody to the floor. Out of the corner of my eye, I could see the almost comically violent double takes of the Albanians who came in the door and saw this bearded stranger speaking Serbian in the corner.

Xhevdet came over for a chess game. He was an elementary schoolteacher and parachutist. He and Jakub started a game, while I taught Durim how to count to 20 in English.

Xhevdet won. While waiting for Jakub to set up the board, he turned to me. "Parachutists have to be very close. They trust each other with their lives. The Serbs and Albanians in our parachuting club are still friends. That's unique."

"Your start," Jakub said. He gestured toward Durim. "A bright boy, eh?"

"Very."

"'Durim' is an Albanian word. It means 'patience.' My generation was given a lot of Arabic names. Like Xhevdet. But now we give Albanian names. Or Catholic."

"Why Catholic?"

"Our leaders recommend it. To play down the Oriental connection. So Europe will be more likely to help us."

"We could solve all our problems here," Xhevdet said expansively, "if everybody just went parachuting together."

"Sure," Jakub said, "and pack the Serbs' parachutes wrong."

"No, I'm serious."

"Your move. Where was I? Oh yes. Some Albanians are even converting to Christianity. I mean, some Albanians have always been Catholic, but some of the Muslims are converting."

"That's going too far," Xhevdet said. "It doesn't look good."

"It looks opportunistic," Jakub agreed.

"The Serbs would say the Albanians' original conversion to Islam was opportunistic," I said.

"Maybe they're right," Xhevdet said cheerfully. "Why not? We Albanians aren't so devout. We have Catholics. We have, what, 20 percent or something who are Orthodox."

"Greek Orthodox, not Serb Orthodox," Jakub hastened to clarify.

"For us, it has always been more important that we are Albanians."

"Yes, we kill each other irrespective of religion."

"James Baker was in Albania a few weeks ago," Xhevdet said excitedly. "Thousands of people were lining the streets, cheering him. He gave Albania $6 million in aid." Whistles. "And this wasn't Government money. This was out of his own pocket."

"I . . . don't think so," I said.

"I heard it! He just pulled it out. It's nothing to him, he's from Texas."

SERBS DESPISE THE Croats and Bosnian Muslims, but they are haunted by the Albanians. Croats are their twins who have gone bad, the unsettling image in the mirror of what the Serbs might have become had not God, in His grace, granted them their Serbness. The Albanians are bogymen.

I was struck by a story told to me by Jasminka, an office worker in the Serbian tourist bureau in Belgrade. Her father had been born in Kosovo, and during World War II, when he was 9, his entire family had been murdered by Albanians. The killers had not harmed him, however, and Jasminka had this explanation: "They let him live so that he would remember." It was inconceivable to her that those Albanians might have spared her father because they could not bring themselves to kill a young boy. No, sparing the child was an extra twist of the knife. In Jasminka's face, I could see a sort of awe at the contemplation of such evil.

A story I heard often concerned young Albanian hooligans who took a Serb baby into a cemetery and tossed it back and forth until it died. The first time I came across this tale, I was struck by its incongruity. Who, I wondered, had thought that up? The answer was no one in this millenium. As I later discovered, there was an early medieval version of the same story: members of a certain Christian sect killed an infant by tossing it same to me. Only now my room cost $41. I suspected I was helping pay for the police.

The clerk was a passionate man. He wondered why Americans didn't understand Serbs. "If you're going to write, do you know about the political situation here?"

"A bit."

"These goddamn Albanians. They are Muslims, you understand?"

"Yes."

"And there are Muslims in Bosnia. So you see, the Green Axis!"

"Excuse me?"

"The Green Axis! Islam! It's aiming at the heart of Europe. Why doesn't Europe care about this?"

"What would you propose?"

"Well. You should know, I am a nationalist." He smiled at the word, seeming both apologetic and serene. "Maybe you will laugh."

"Somehow I don't think so."

"The Albanians don't belong here. This is Yugoslavia. Yugoslavs belong here. Albanians belong in Albania!"

How simple. How ... incontrovertible.

"I see," I said.

"You understand?"

"Perfectly. And ... so ... with all these Albanians, we. ...?"

"Send them back to Albania."

"Yes, of course. Although it does seem like a lot of people to move. Two million — "

"Only a million and a half."

"That's still a lot. The logistics — "

"Oh," he pooh-poohed, "it's not so hard. Look at how many people were moved during World War II."

"By Stalin, you mean."

"By everybody!"

EPIC POETRY IS one of the glories of Serbian culture. It is Exhibit A in the Serbs' case for their supreme worth as a nation. Of their three great cycles of epic poetry, one revolves around the events of St. Vitus's Day 1389, when the Turks under Sultan Murad I engaged a coalition of Christian forces led by the Serbian Prince Lazar on the Field of Blackbirds — Kosovo Polje.

The actual military importance of the Battle of Kosovo Polje has always been in doubt. The Serbs had fought other battles with the Turks before Kosovo, and would fight a few more afterward. But it is not hard to see why this one confrontation was chosen by the poets to stand for the destruction of the Serbian state and the fall of a 500-year night. The Battle of Kosovo had poetry in it because the leaders of both armies — Prince Lazar of Serbia and the Sultan Murad — died in the fighting.

Serbs say Kosovo is their Jerusalem. They were scattered northward from the holy precinct, leaving behind some of their most superb monasteries, buildings revered throughout the world as architectural and artistic masterpieces (Exhibit B). They brought with them their songs, so that Kosovo would never be lost to memory. And the songs elevated the Battle of Kosovo into the Serbs' fall of Troy. It was like a dream they experienced anew each time they listened to them. Generation after generation passed down the songs of Kosovo, and the great poems lit under the name a blaze of meaning and banked it deep in people's minds, far beyond the reach of reason.

I WAS MET OUTSIDE MY hotel by Gazmend. A pale man with large slate eyes, he was Albanian, a professor of electrical engineering at Pristina University and president of the Kosovo branch of the Helsinki Committee for Human Rights. His short hair stood up in a flattop on his head, giving him a perpetually surprised look.

"I don't know why I still have my job at the university," he said. "If you're 15 minutes late, they'll fire you. They say the university is the center of Albanian separatism." (Some months after I left Kosovo, he was dismissed.)

As we walked toward his car, he gestured down the modern main street. "They tore out the heart of the old town to build this. Your hotel sits on the site of a mosque. And they said it proved they wanted to develop Kosovo."

Since Albanian professors at Pristina University were dismissed, students have continued with their studies in homes, part of an elaborate underground network.

I noticed that the stolid Parliament building was shut up. "The great irony of the 1990 independence declaration was that the Serbs had handpicked the delegates to the Kosovo Parliament," Gazmend continued. "These were the Albanians whom the Serbs thought they could trust. Toadies and idiots. But when it was discovered that the Serbian Parliament was planning to abolish Kosovo's separate status, it was these men who had to pass the resolution last July declaring the independence of Kosovo from Serbia. And now they are all in hiding. Our heroes!"

Gazmend smiled. "The declaration was passed just before the weekend, so it wasn't until the following Monday that the Serbs abolished the Parliament and instituted martial law. During that one weekend of independence, everyone I met in the street was so elated. Everyone was saying, 'If we'd known it would be this easy, we'd have done it years ago!'" Gazmend laughed. "So, legalistically, Kosovo is independent. I mean, it was unconstitutional, but everything here is unconstitutional."

His car was a battered Yugo, with a sun visor that kept falling on his head. We stopped to pick up another professor mysteriously still employed, and headed out past the apartment blocks to a weedy, empty highway. (He, too, was subsequently fired. To prevent possible reprisals against him, he is not named.) We crossed a low ridge and in front of us stretched Kosovo Polje, an extensive rolling plain of dirty green and dun. Every May, the plain was covered with millions of brilliant crimson flowers called Kosovo poppies. The Serbs say the color derived from the blood of the Serbs who fell at the Battle of Kosovo. But this was mid-July, hot and washed out, and the flowers were long dead.

About three miles out into the plain, we turned off the highway and drove up to the memorial to the heroes of Kosovo. We climbed the tower and looked out over the plain. A bronze tablet showed where the Serbian and Turkish Armies had been arrayed.

"This is wrong," Gazmend's colleague said, tapping the label that said "Serbian Forces."

"Two Albanian princes with their armies were part of the Christian coalition," Gazmend said.

"And the Kosovo poppies?" I asked.

Gazmend smiled broadly. "The blood of Albanians."

I laughed.

"It's true!" Gazmend's friend said hotly.

My two guides pointed out the army compound on the hill by the ridge leading toward town and the tanks lined up inside it, aiming at the front gate. "The Serbs are ready to go," Gazmend commented. We could make out other emplacements along the ridge, huddled conferences of tanks and artillery pieces, positioned, it would appear, for the shelling of Pristina.

In 1912, when the Serbs finally drove the Turks out of Kosovo, they fell to kiss the holy ground. But when they rose again, they saw that Kosovo cleared of its Turks was not at all an empty land. The Albanians had always been there, even in the days of Serbian strength and glory. But they had lived in the mountains, eternal refugees, an unorganized sprawl of shepherds.

For much of the Middle Ages, "Albania" (which only came into existence as a country in 1912) was an archipelago of mountaintops and ranges in the seas of Serbia and Byzantium. When the Serbs began to migrate north in the 14th century, the sea became Turkish, but the Turks did not care who joined them as long as they were Muslim. The highlanders descended from the harsh hills, becoming Muslim en masse.

Between the world wars, the Serbs did their best to make these intruders on their hallowed land feel invisible. Kosovo was the poorest region in the country, and stayed that way. There were no Albanian public schools. The official language in all public spheres was Serbian. When Yugoslavia was dismembered in 1941, Kosovo and the Albanian-inhabited portion of Macedonia were folded into a Greater Albania under Italian protection. But Tito's partisans won the war, Kosovo was returned to Yugoslavia and the Albanians living there were oppressed once more.

Then in 1968, demonstrations broke out in Pristina, with the Albanians demand-

Here is a special catalog from Lands' End:

Fine clothing for men who hate to shop, and their discerning wives.

We named it "Beyond Buttondowns" and here's how it came about:

All men are not created equal when it comes to their patience in shopping today's men stores, with their mix of intrusive or indifferent clerks. Nor do they all share the gift for recognizing true value, and choosing what's best suited to them.

We know. We're among those who depend heavily on the taste of discerning wives, with their experienced clutch at the sleeve of a hanging sportcoat, a brazen glance at a hidden label, and a knowledgeable riffle through a blinding array of ties.

Hence, our new catalog for both.

We call it "Beyond Buttondowns", both to underline its unpretentiousness, and its origin. We're the no-nonsense "cut and sewn" people who've been called King of the Buttondowns, and are known as The Place for Sweaters. So—even though we're now moving up into a wider array of fine clothing, we promise to remain true to our emphasis on quality first, then comfortable prices that denote value, and seamlessly friendly customer service.

Our first issue of this new catalog has let us know you're out there—you who appreciate shopping from the comfort of your own home, either by calling our toll-free number, 1-800-356-4444, or through the mail. And who are reassured by our implacable guarantee. So gracious, we can state it in two words: GUARANTEED. PERIOD.®

Just off the press: our second issue.

Like our premier issue, our newest "Beyond Buttondowns" features out-sized photos of our expanded shirt and tie lines, with endlessly informative discussions of what they are, exactly, how they got that way, and why they are values.

Then, too, when appropriate, we will feature the rare and the ultimate in quality and value. In our premier issue, it was the John Partridge trench coat, a sell-out. In this issue, it's the 100% Irish linen jackets for men—the genuine Moygashels, in Black, Natural, Green, Maize, Indigo, and Eggplant. World class at any price. At our prices, incomparable!

But, enough for now. It's your move.

By all means—phone or use the coupon at right for your copy of "Beyond Buttondowns". It'll restore your confidence in the clothing you like, and explain why you're right in liking it. What's more, you and yours can share it—quietly, at home, at your leisure and above all, to your substantial mutual advantage!

riveting severity of an asymmetric swallowtail, the smolder that shrouds each chiffon gown — announces a woman whose mystery is matched by her self-esteem.

The future is also Rifat Ozbek, who combines seemingly disparate elements like angora, stretch Lurex and sheer velvet into unexpected exoticism. (In lesser hands, his look would be called tropical military waif.)

The future is Gianni Versace, who, discarding past obsessions as fast as he perfects them, has banished multilayered bell-bottoms and Caribbean prints in favor of a blinding explosion of stretch cable-knit dresses and lace gowns that would have been impossible to manufacture just several years ago.

The future wafts around Giorgio Armani. Though his new, full-throttled inroads into color are surprisingly harsh, the allure of the East has added the illusion of weightlessness to his tailoring.

The future is Karl Lagerfeld, whose insouciant fur creations for Fendi temper bold arrogance with brilliant wit. And the future is at Callaghan, where Romeo Gigli indulges in romanticism without foppishness, showing how one supple, sweeping curve beats seven floppy flounces anytime.

These artisans have made modern clothes that work because they understand the new technology, exult in the physicality of our evolving vanity and sympathize with an unsentimental view of reality. Their achievements don't mean that fantasy is dead. It just means that once in a while you have to get in and out of a cab. ■ around and afterward tore the infant's body apart, mixing its blood into flour for the sacred host.

The most unsettling aspect of all this was the unanimity of Serbs' opinions about the Albanians — from drunks to bartenders to journalists to university professors. Even people who managed to be rational about the Croats and Bosnians invariably spoke of the Albanians as though their skin crawled.

It had, therefore, seemed to me like a breath of fresh air when, two years earlier in Pristina, I had met a Serbian couple who actually liked Albanians (and who asked that their names not be used). She had been born in Pristina and spoke fluent Albanian — practically unheard of. She was also a sociologist in a country where the discipline hardly existed and she could talk about Albanian culture and family structure without the Serbs' usual dread. Her husband, a bureaucrat, was the only Serb at his workplace and he got along well with his Albanian co-workers.

But this year, when I told an Albanian friend that I was going to visit the couple, he said, "They have changed." He would not elaborate.

They met me at the door of their one-room apartment and we sat for coffee. The bureaucrat held his infant son on his lap. He and his wife seemed the same: she fluttering nervously with an air of being anxious to please; he with his quiet, monkish demeanor, his charming, opaque smile. His beard was trimmer. Perhaps that was in keeping with his new position as director of his office.

And Shkelzen? And Isuf? I asked.

He said they were no longer working with him. No Albanians were. Good riddance.

"When the Government started firing Albanians," she said, "it justified its actions on the grounds that they were separatists. Why even get into that? All they had to say was that the Albanians hadn't shown up for work in a month. Isn't that a good enough reason?"

What had happened to change their opinions?

"My husband and I have been disappointed in our Albanian friends," she said. "Albanians are only Albanians. That's the only way they define themselves. An Albanian can go to Belgrade or Slovenia and meet other people, become cosmopolitan. But when he comes back to his house in the village, he is exactly as he used to be. He's back in that rigid system. It's a closed society."

"But you already knew that," I said.

"I think it's the most closed society in Europe. My specialty as a sociologist is the role of women in Albanian society. But they won't let me talk to them anymore. If an Albanian sociologist was interested in Serbian culture, I would be absolutely delighted. The more we understand one another, the better. But the Albanians don't want me to do my work."

Was this the crux of the problem? Had the Albanians closed ranks, leaving the sociologist, who no doubt had prided herself on her almost unique access, feeling rejected, betrayed?

"They live in extended families of 40 or 50 people, all in a single compound," she was saying. "They have so many children! The head man is called 'the god of the house,' and each member is absolutely circumscribed by his or her role."

"You already knew that," I pointed out again.

"But the Serbs gave up that system 40 years ago. Serb families are normal — little families." Her angry gesture took in her husband and their son. The three-member family in a one-room apartment. The 20th century.

At the door, she spoke lightly but searchingly. "A friend of mine says you must be a spy. You're not C.I.A., are you?"

"No. Although I suppose if I were, I wouldn't admit it."

"I've lived here for 27 years. Perhaps I'm paranoid."

She closed the door.

HE LIVED NEAR THE center of Pristina, down a dark alley, in a room that was six feet by six feet. He sported a mop of curly ash hair, a full uncombed beard and steel-rimmed granny glasses with darkened lenses. The index finger and thumb of his right hand were stained nicotine-orange. Anywhere else in the world, he would be taken for a Beat poet or a John Lennon wannabe. Here, he was obviously a Chetnik.

I think he enjoyed it, the surrealist conversations with Serbs about the goddamn Albanians, the near-confrontations with Albanians who did not realize he was Albanian. He liked the feeling of marginality. He felt safer out there, beyond group feeling.

His landlady had wanted to kick him out during the demonstrations the previous year — she had said she feared reprisals from other Serbs — but he had convinced her to raise his rent instead. Now he paid 50 Deutschmarks (about $30) a month. That was virtually his only expense. He went for days at a time on nothing but coffee and cigarettes, and his friends often

MILAN REPORT

THE MILANESE SHOULD HAVE hired Meryl Streep as she was in "Death Becomes Her" to be Fashion Week's official greeter. At the first sight of her heading backward into the future, we would have been better prepared for the Chesterfield jackets worn over chiffon gowns and tuxedo pants, the wenchy camisoles under redingotes, the gauzy pre-Raphaelite dresses with shredded denim shorts, and the other hybrid forms of glitz coming down the runway at Anna Molinari Blumarine.

Blumarine rarely offers an inventive collection, but Molinari's reputation as a lightning-speed assimilator of trends makes this an indicative one. And though the city's current preoccupation with Italy's political scandals may have something to do with it (one bilingual editor was furious that the local news wasn't televising a lot of fashion, "considering that we're only here for a week"), it's obvious that Milan is having a hard time dealing with the present.

Unlike last season, however, when designers uniformly ransacked old Biba catalogues for any trace of the 70's, now the entire past, idyllically reconceived, is up for grabs. Unfortunately, like a day in a time machine preset for five-minute layovers, the focus is often scattered and diffuse, with great ideas, as well as tatters and rags, being plucked up and tossed out to see what sticks.

It's a myth that the past is there for the taking. Like all aspects of culture, clothes out of social and economic context rarely make sense. In a world too much with us, what we need, in fact, what we crave, is not fashion designed when youth was the majority, but clothes that are modern.

When Dolce & Gabbana nip the waist of a military coat or split the seams of a seemingly staid crushed velvet dress, looking back for inspiration works. But feather chokers, patchwork jackets (fabric squares blanketed Milan) and foot-long fringe made one fashion illustrator fear that she was suffering from déjà drew.

But Dolce & Gabbana were merely minor raiders of the lost spark. Happily, we have seen the future, and it is Jil Sander. The subtle fluidity with which she imbued austere tailoring — the springs back undented from a light touch, it's done. Smell is also an infallible tip-off that bread is toasted, syrup is warm, a fruit compote has simmered enough to give it flavor, that bananas for topping pancakes have baked long enough to caramelize into a light gloss.

But smell is a less useful guide to a finely cooked egg. To judge an egg one needs a trained eye. Expert poaching, scrambling, frying and basting require that the cook recognize the moment after the white has clouded and before it stiffens, the moment when the yolk begins to fade from orange to daffodil. Baking an egg, because its progress is slower and more easily observed, helps develop this instinct. To the young cook, baking also provides a satisfying abundance of cups and pans that can be piled in the sink, broken on the floor and left to crack on a hot stove as evidence of effort.

Such ramifications, I am sorry to report, seem intrinsic to cooking from the heart. Early bouts with pancake mix may eventually progress to buckwheat cakes with baked bananas or to low-fat waffles made from sweet potatoes; store-bought coffeecakes may one day transmogrify into a toothsome confection made from scratch. But though the food may evolve, the kitchen will usually look about the same. And guess who does the dishes?

Baked Eggs With Chives

- 2 teaspoons unsalted butter
- 8 teaspoons heavy cream
- 4 eggs
- Salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste
- 2 teaspoons chopped fresh chives.

1. Preheat the oven to 375 degrees. Place ½ teaspoon of the butter and 1 teaspoon of the heavy cream in the bottom of each of 4 ramekins. Break 1 egg into each ramekin. Top each egg with 1 teaspoon of heavy cream and sprinkle with salt and pepper.

2. Place the ramekins on a small baking pan. Pour in enough boiling water to reach halfway up the ramekins. Bake until the egg white is set and the yolks are still soft, about 5 to 6 minutes. The eggs will continue to cook after they come out of the oven. Sprinkle with the chives and serve immediately.

Yield: Four servings.

Maple Pecan Granola

- 8 cups rolled oats
- 2 cups coarsely chopped pecans
- 4 teaspoons ground cinnamon
- 2 teaspoons ground nutmeg
- 1½ teaspoons salt
- 2 teaspoons orange rind
- ½ cup maple syrup
- ½ cup fresh orange juice
- ½ cup canola oil
- 1½ cups chopped, pitted dates.

1. Preheat the oven to 350 degrees. In a large bowl, combine the oats, pecans, cinnamon, nutmeg and salt. In a separate bowl, whisk together the orange rind, maple syrup, orange juice and oil. Pour over the oat mixture. Use your hands to thoroughly combine the ingredients. Divide the mixture between 2 baking sheets. Bake for 30 minutes, stirring twice.

2. Return the hot granola to the bowl and stir in the dates. Let cool. Store in an airtight container.

Yield: Nine cups.

Granola Muffins

- 1½ cups all-purpose flour
- 1 cup sugar
- 2 teaspoons baking powder
- ½ teaspoon baking soda
- 1 cup maple pecan granola (see recipe)
- ¼ cup canola oil
- 8 ounces plain, nonfat yogurt
- 2 eggs
- 1 teaspoon vanilla extract.

1. Preheat the oven to 350 degrees. Sift together the flour, sugar, baking powder and baking soda into a large mixing bowl. Stir in the granola. In a separate bowl, whisk together the oil, yogurt, eggs and vanilla. Make a well in the dry ingredients, pour in the yogurt mixture and stir gently just until combined.

2. Line a muffin tin with paper liners. Spoon the batter into the muffin tin and bake until a toothpick inserted in the center of the muffins comes out clean, about 20 to 25 minutes. Serve warm.

Yield: Twelve muffins.

Buckwheat Pancakes With Baked Bananas And Blueberries

The bananas:

- 3 bananas, peeled and cut into ¼-inch-thick slices
- 1 cup fresh or frozen blueberries
- 1½ tablespoons honey
- ⅛ teaspoon ground cinnamon

The pancakes:

- ½ cup, plus 2 tablespoons, buckwheat flour
- ½ cup plus 2 tablespoons all-purpose flour
- 1 tablespoon baking powder
- 1 tablespoon sugar
- ½ teaspoon salt
- 1 cup lowfat milk
- 2 tablespoons canola oil
- 2 egg whites
- Vegetable oil spray.

1. Preheat the oven to 350 degrees. Combine the banana slices and the blueberries in a 9-inch pie plate. Drizzle with the honey and sprinkle with cinnamon. Bake for 25 minutes. Keep warm.

2. Sift the dry ingredients together. In a medium bowl, whisk the milk and oil together. Stir in the flour mixture until just combined. Beat the egg whites until stiff but not dry. Stir ⅓ of the whites into the batter to lighten. Fold in the remaining whites.

3. Spray a griddle with the vegetable oil and place over medium heat until hot. Working in batches, spoon the batter onto the griddle and cook until browned on both sides and cooked in the center. Serve immediately with the baked bananas and blueberries.

Yield: Four servings.

Sweet-Potato Waffles

- ¾ cup cold, mashed sweet potatoes
- 1 tablespoon melted margarine
- 2 medium egg whites, lightly beaten
- 1½ cups lowfat milk
- 1 cup all-purpose flour
- 2 teaspoons baking powder
- ¾ teaspoon salt
- ¼ teaspoon ground cinnamon
- Vegetable oil spray.

1. Preheat a waffle iron. In a large bowl, whisk the sweet potatoes, margarine and egg whites together until smooth. Gradually whisk in the milk. Sift together the flour, baking powder, salt and cinnamon and stir them into the sweet-potato mixture.

2. Spray the waffle iron with vegetable oil. Pour about ¾ cup of the batter onto the center of the waffle iron. Cook until well browned and crisp. Repeat with the remaining batter. Serve immediately with maple syrup.

Yield: Four servings.

Apricot-Vanilla Compote With Buttermilk Almond Loaf

The compote:

- 8 fresh apricots, halved, pitted and cut into ½-inch-thick slices
- ½ cup vanilla extract.

The almond loaf:

- ½ cup unsalted butter, at room temperature, plus more for greasing the pan
- 1 cup sugar
- 2 eggs
- 1 teaspoon grated orange rind
- ½ teaspoon vanilla extract
- ½ teaspoon almond extract
- 1 cup all-purpose flour
- 1 teaspoon baking powder
- ½ teaspoon baking soda
- ½ teaspoon salt
- ½ cup ground almonds
- ½ cup buttermilk
- ¼ cup water
- 2 tablespoons toasted sliced almonds.

1. To make the compote, place the apricot slices in a bowl and toss with the vanilla. Let stand for 2 hours.

2. Preheat the oven to 350 degrees. Butter and flour a 9-by-5-by-3-inch loaf pan. Place the ½ cup of butter in a mixing bowl and beat with an electric mixer until light. Gradually add ¾ cup of the sugar and beat until light and fluffy, stopping occasionally to scrape the bowl. Add the eggs one at a time, beating well. Mix in the orange rind and the extracts.

3. Sift together the flour, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Stir the ground almonds into the flour mixture. With mixer on low speed, add the dry ingredients alternately with the buttermilk, beginning and ending with the dry ingredients and scraping the bowl between additions. Scrape the batter into the prepared pan. Bake until a toothpick inserted in the center of the cake comes out clean, about 45 minutes. Place on a rack to cool for 10 minutes. Carefully turn the cake out of the pan and place upright on the rack.

4. While the cake is still warm, place the remaining ¼ cup sugar and the water in a small saucepan and bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer for 5 minutes. Brush some of the syrup over the top of the cake and sprinkle with the sliced almonds. When the cake is cool, cut it into slices and serve with the apricots.

Yield: Eight servings.

Portuguese French Toast With Bacon

- 6 strips of bacon
- 4 eggs, lightly beaten
- ½ cup milk
- 1 teaspoon sugar
- ¼ teaspoon nutmeg
- ¼ teaspoon cinnamon
- 8 slices sweet bread (preferrably stale), like Portuguese sweet bread or brioche.

1. In a large skillet over medium heat, cook the bacon until crisp. Remove and let the bacon drain on paper towels and set aside. Reserve the bacon fat.

2. Combine the lightly beaten eggs with the milk, sugar, nutmeg and cinnamon. Soak the bread in this mixture for 5 minutes so that each side is coated.

3. Drain half the bacon fat from the skillet and reserve. Place the skillet on medium heat and, when warm, fry 4 slices of the bread until golden on each side, about 3 minutes. Repeat this using the reserved bacon fat and the remaining bread. Crumble the bacon over each slice and serve, two slices to a plate. The Portuguese toast can be served with warm honey or maple syrup. It can also be served with baked bananas (see recipe), warm applesauce or fresh berries.

paid for those. Sometimes he was treated to meals by journalists for whom he translated.

He was a translator of Beat poetry. His work had not appeared for a year because the Kosovo magazines only wanted Albanian poems and Albanian folklore. He didn't like that sort of cultural chest-thumping and had gotten depressed and stopped working. He was also scornful of Ibrahim Rugova, the president of the Democratic Alliance of Kosovo. (In clandestine elections held in May 1992, Rugova became President of the Republic of Kosovo.)

"He keeps telling everyone to keep quiet, to wait, to put up with all the bull. So we don't give the Serbs an excuse for killing us all. Maybe it's the right strategy, but I don't know. I think he's overestimating Europe's willingness to help us and underestimating the Serbs' willingness to keep right on kicking the hell out of someone who's lying motionless on the ground."

"Were you involved in any of the demonstrations last year?" I asked.

> It's crazy to protest against somebody who is perfectly happy to kill you.

He laughed. "Me? Forget it! It's crazy to protest against somebody who is perfectly happy to kill you. They don't need an excuse. A Serb in the street could shoot me at any time and nothing would happen to him. At least if he killed somebody's chicken, he'd have to pay for it."

One day, he and I walked several miles through the countryside to his ancestral village. As we cleared the top of the last hill, he spread his arms and, with an uncharacteristic lack of irony, announced, "The most beautiful village in the world!" It seemed, indeed, a competitor, with the sun shading orange and sliding off our backs, the white walls snaking along the contours of the land like mini Great Walls, the intricate gates of woven saplings, the mountains rearing up behind. We pressed on to his uncle's house for tea.

Later, with a dozen of his friends, we walked up a narrow valley to the source of the stream that watered the village. We all took a drink where the stream bubbled up cool and clear from the hillside, then walked back down through the growing dusk. Someone climbed a wall and came back with an armload of cucumbers, passing one to each. We sat in the grass eating the cucumbers, watching the stars come out, and conversation turned to imponderables, as it will do under the stars. Golden past, leaden present, nameless dread, precarious life, transient youth, inevitable women.

It occurred to me that for all the self-vaunting talk in Yugoslavia about the "real" Croat or Serb or Muslim culture that I would find in those untrammeled Croat or Serb or Muslim villages, only in Kosovo were the old rural traditions still more or less intact — and all they aroused in the Serbs was hatred and in Croats and Slovenes a vague unease about "backwardness." My beatnik friend himself admitted, with frank ruefulness: "O.K., I know we've been here the whole time, fine. I know that. But you can see the Roman baths, the Turkish mosques, the Serbian monasteries. Where are our buildings?"

The answer, of course, was everywhere — in the mud-brick villages.

I slept that night in his uncle's house. The next day, a cousin took us on a sightseeing trip in his car, and many miles from the village the car ran low on fuel and all of the gas stations were empty. The rumor was that gasoline was being diverted for army use.

We hitched a ride on a truck. The driver would never have stopped for two Chetniks, he said, but he recognized the cousin. He said he had heard a rumor that the Serbs were calling Albanian reserves into the army. He knew of drivers who had been called and were hiding, using only the back roads.

"Why would the Serbs want potentially unreliable Albanians in their army?" I naively asked.

"To get the men out of the villages," my friend said.

"Ah. So they won't be able to fight if the Serbs crack down."

"Well, mainly to get them all into a camp somewhere, so the Serbs can shoot them all before they crack down," the driver said. He dropped us off in the middle of fields. "The police have a roadblock up ahead," he said apologetically, "and they would give me trouble for transporting you. A bus stops here sometimes." He headed off, calling out the window, "See you when we're free!" ■

THE MOMMY SNACK

MOTHER'S DAY DEMANDS a temporary turn of the tables, or at least a partial one. Get up early, prepare an elaborate breakfast, carry it triumphantly on a tray to Mother, who tries to smile while knowing that every available cooking utensil has been burned or encrusted, every surface in the kitchen left looking like a Jackson Pollock canvas. Good intentions can be sloppy; good will can wreak havoc with order. But tidy bouquets and Mother's Day cards bespeak a certain emotional entropy. Cooking, on the other hand, remains a living, breathing sentiment, a task that summons forth both sorcerer and nurturer.

For the budding cook, breakfast is the simplest meal to negotiate between these two urges. First, the timing is felicitous: inhibition and self-doubt are slow risers, so the early-morning chef is more likely to favor instinct and invention rather than the dictates of a recipe. This is the difference between cooking and rendering a formula, between a dish with life and static sustenance. The cook who is confident of his or her instincts grows into a cook who is seldom foiled by the nuance of ingredients, cookware, weather and heat source, all the things that make recipes, however well intentioned, fallible.

My brothers and I were lucky to initiate our annual, breakfast-in-bed, Mother's Day ritual before we could read. We had only our senses and tactile memory to guide us.

Fortunately, the nature of breakfast food is forgiving enough to bear improvisation. It also profits from observation. Quick coffeecakes, pancakes, muffins or waffles don't demand an acute technical training. They are simple and obvious dishes, whose cooking is best supervised by the [redacted].

When a pancake begins to smell like a pancake, when bubbles geyser from the bottom to the surface of the batter, the pancake is ready to flip. The smell test works with waffles as well: batter whose aroma begs for butter and syrup will lift gracefully from an iron. When a coffeecake or muffin turns golden, shrinks from the edge of the baking pan and stock swindles on Wall Street for New York mafia families. It seems that some of Hellerman's clients machine-gunned his suburban home. Hellerman turned state's evidence and was one of the first people to enter the Government's witness protection program, becoming Mike Rapp.

Rather than use his Government-provided identity to start a new way of life, Rapp instead used it to defraud banks and savings and loans during the 1980's. In addition to Flushing Federal, Rapp also hit Florida Center Bank in Orlando, where millions of dollars in fraudulent loans were extracted before the F.B.I. caught up with him.

Rapp was convicted and sentenced to 32 years in prison for the Florida Center theft and 15 years for Flushing Federal. Initially the court ordered him to pay $1.75 million in fines. But his sentence would later be pruned on appeal to 15 years in prison and $100,000 in fines.

Rapp was released on parole in 1992 after serving five and a half years. His lawyer, Paul D. Lazarus, says his client now has $100 a month coming out of his salary but could offer no specifics on how much of his client's $100,000 fine has been paid. No one in the F.D.I.C., the Department of Justice or the Federal courts seems to know either. The last time Government lawyers checked was June 1992; Rapp had repaid nothing.

CHARLES J. BAZARIAN

Oklahoma City
Losses Caused: $329 million.
Ordered to Repay: $100,000.
Amount Repaid: $19,000.
Time Served: 28 months.

Charles J. Bazarian ran a $200 million borrowing scam during the deregulated 1980's. Bazarian had a lot of ways to milk money out of unsuspecting banks and thrifts. Sometimes he put up phony promissory notes as collateral; sometimes he put the same notes up as collateral at more than one bank. This wasn't his first time around: in the 1970's, he ran a bogus insurance company, got caught and pleaded guilty to bilking Oklahoma farmers out of $347,000 in insurance fees and premiums. In that case, full restitution was made. In return for testifying against his partner he was placed on probation and served no prison time.

During the 1980's Bazarian was accused of defrauding the Department of Housing and Urban Development on projects it financed. But loose banks and deregulated S.& L.'s provided him with his biggest hit. By the middle of the decade Bazarian, a former fry cook, was living in a 21,400-square-foot $2.4 million mansion outside Oklahoma City, replete with an indoor pool that had a waterfall and retractable dome.

Bazarian's borrowing schemes were just a giant house of cards, and when his company, C. B. Financial, was forced into bankruptcy by creditors in 1988, thrift regulators estimated that Bazarian had caused more than $100 million in losses at S.& L.'s across the country.

In September 1989 Bazarian was convicted and sentenced to two years in prison and three years' probation, and fined $10,000 for swindling $20 million from two California S.& L.'s and skimming at least $100,000 from a low-income H.U.D. project. He had already been convicted — along with Mike Rapp — in the Florida Center case, for which he had been sentenced to two years and fined $100,000.

Bazarian served less than two years in prison, literally talking his way out early by cooperating with investigators on other cases. He is now living in Oklahoma City and has paid $18,000 of his $100,000 fine. Though he says he is working as a "self-employed consultant," he would not disclose what kind of consulting he was doing or for whom. But a Federal prosecutor who met with him two months earlier says that during their meeting Bazarian sang the praises of something he claimed was a "completely legal steroid substitute."

When asked if he was indeed selling steroids, Bazarian was quick to point out that his product was a dietary substitute for steroids. "No, no, not steroids," he protested. "They're illegal."

MARIO RENDA

Garden City, L.I.
Losses Caused: $16 million.
Ordered to Repay: $9.9 million.
Amount Repaid: $505,000.
Time Served: 21 months.

Mario Renda had been a camp director in the Berkshires and a music teacher, among other professions, until 1979, when he formed his own brokerage business, First United Fund. His partner, Martin J. Schwimmer, had associates with ties to the Lucchese mafia family of New York and corrupt union locals. First United Fund would be paid commissions by banks and S.& L.'s to place the union members' pension money into certificates of deposit. In return for the business, Renda and his partner would pay union officials kickbacks. Along the way the pair also found time to steal about $16 million in union funds.

Placing billions of dollars on deposit at banks and thrifts ($100 million from the unions alone) gave Renda no small degree of leverage over these institutions, and he soon developed a lucrative "linked financing" scheme. Renda would place millions of dollars on deposit at an institution if the bank agreed to lend a percentage of the money deposited to a group of borrowers Renda would send to the bank. The borrowers were simply individuals paid to masquerade as borrowers. They would actually turn the money over to Renda's people and be paid a percentage of what they borrowed. Renda would also pay his "mortgage pullers" a percentage of the volume created by any new pullers they brought in.

The scheme violated a host of Federal criminal laws, including RICO, and the banks and S.& L.'s suffered fatal losses, but Renda prospered. He bought a Garden City mansion, an 80-passenger BAC-111 executive jet and a 100-foot yacht dubbed the Surrenda.

In 1987 Renda was indicted by the Organized Crime Strike Force of the Justice Department in Brooklyn. He pleaded guilty to bank fraud and taking union kickbacks. Renda was ordered to repay $9.9 million in restitution and $125,000 in criminal fines. Of the $9.9 million, $4.25 million would go to the unions and the balance to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to repay at least some of the money Renda had taken from S.& L.'s and banks.

The F.D.I.C. believed it was better positioned than the Justice Department to collect the money from Renda. But Justice had agreed to collect the union's share of the money, so F.D.I.C. lawyers promised that if allowed to take the lead they would guarantee the unions their $4.25 million. With that guarantee in place the Justice Department stepped aside to let the F.D.I.C. seize and liquidate Renda's assets.

On Feb. 24, 1989, the agreement was signed. The F.D.I.C. was able to recover $500,000 from Renda's Swiss bank account almost immediately. They also seized his jet and yacht, but Renda had borrowed the money to buy the yacht. The jet, it turned out, needed work. The Government netted an insignificant amount from the sale of those two assets.

In prison Renda was being not entirely cooperative when it came to helping authorities sort out his assets and have them transferred to the F.D.I.C. Deeds mailed to his cell were returned unopened or unsigned, Federal authorities say. "He kind of jerked us around," one prosecutor acknowledges.

Nevertheless, in January 1991, without notifying the F.D.I.C., the Federal Department of Corrections granted Renda early parole. With Renda free, the F.D.I.C. lost whatever leverage it had over him and recovery ground to a virtual halt.

The clerk of Federal District Court in Brooklyn says that, as of April 1992, Renda had repaid only $950 of his $125,000 fine. As for his $9.9 million in court-ordered restitution, the F.D.I.C. is still about $9.4 million short.

Alan J. Whitney, chief spokesman for the F.D.I.C., agrees that Renda took the agency for a ride. Not only did the F.D.I.C. not get what it had coming, but it was also forced to make good on its promise to repay the unions — F.D.I.C. officials won't say how much. "Our people are very dissatisfied with the results of the entire exercise," Whitney says. "That's all I'm authorized to say about that case."

While the F.D.I.C. and Justice Department were trying to collect from Renda, the Department of Commerce was busily promoting his newest enterprise. An item in the December 1992 issue of Commercial News USA — a magazine distributed by the department to more than 140 foreign embassies and countries, listing American-made products available for export — carried information about a fuel-expansion believed that Molinaro had transferred $2.2 million in assets to his then-wife, $900,000 to trusts benefiting his children, $700,000 in cash and notes to another ex-wife, a condominium to one of his former mothers-in-law, and that he had at least $3 million in cash hidden in offshore bank accounts under fictitious names. Molinaro denied the allegations. The F.D.I.C. recovered about $4 million in civil judgments from Molinaro, leaving him penniless and therefore unable to pay the $6.7 million in restitution.

Of the fines and restitution that were ordered, the Government has collected about 4.5 percent.

DON DIXON

Dallas
Losses Caused: $40 million.
Ordered to Repay: $611,200.
Amount Repaid: 0.
Time Served: Serving two consecutive 5-year sentences.

Don Dixon owned Vernon Savings Association in Dallas, a thrift so notorious it earned the nickname "Vermin Savings" from Federal regulators. Vernon Savings cost taxpayers $1.3 billion when it failed in 1987. When Federal regulators autopsied Vernon Savings they found the cause of death: more than 95 percent of the thrift's loans were in default. The only explanation for such a rate was that the loans were never intended to be repaid.

Federal regulators sued Dixon for $540 million, accusing him of using his company, Dondi Financial Corporation, to loot Vernon Savings. Dixon filed for bankruptcy, claiming that he was broke in order to avoid the Federal civil action. During his bankruptcy hearing the judge asked him why, if he was so broke, he was driving a Ferrari. Dixon explained that it was a "family Ferrari," and not an extravagance. Asked what made it a family Ferrari, Dixon explained that it had an automatic transmission.

When Federal prosecutors tried to fashion a criminal case against Dixon, they found that the matrix of interlocking companies and subsidiaries he used to drain off Vernon's money had obscured his direct involvement behind layers of corporate subordinates. "His signature rarely showed up on the actual documents," one prosecutor, Marvin Collins, complained.

After months of investigation the Government charged Dixon with conspiring to defraud Vernon Savings of $611,200 and misusing Vernon's funds to buy a $2 million California beach house. Though the amount was low, the number of fraud counts in the indictment exposed Dixon to up to 120 years behind bars.

Dixon was convicted in late 1990, but to Collins's dismay the judge, A. Joe Fish of Federal District Court, sentenced Dixon to five years in jail, followed by five years' probation. Collins then asked that Dixon at least be ordered to pay restitution of $33.7 million. But the judge decided that Dixon should only have to repay the $611,200.

Dixon would have been eligible for parole next year had he not been indicted a second time. In February 1992, he was charged with illegally diverting additional funds from Vernon for his own uses. Dixon pleaded guilty to the second indictment; at his sentencing he pleaded with the judge for probation because of a serious heart ailment. Federal Judge Robert Maloney sentenced him to five more years, to be served consecutively with his first sentence.

Collins says Dixon has worked out a deal with prosecutors and is cooperating on other investigations in return for sentencing consideration.

And what of his $611,200 fine? "He's broke," says his lawyer, William Ravkind. "He's really broke. Dirt poor."■

Dixon said he was broke, but could still drive a Ferrari. It was a 'family Ferrari' he said.

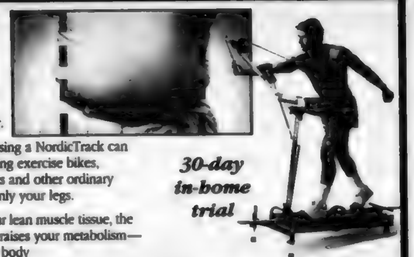
Trim along the dotted lines with NordicTrack.

NordicTrack melts unwanted inches away.

Get rid of those "love handles" with a NordicTrack® exerciser.



Research shows that using a NordicTrack can burn more fat than using exercise bikes, treadmills, stairsteppers and other ordinary exercisers that work only your legs.

Plus, by increasing your lean muscle tissue, the NordicTrack exerciser raises your metabolism—the rate at which your body consumes calories.

30-day in-home trial

Models priced from $339.95

NordicTrack is easy.

With a NordicTrack you can trim and tone your entire body — including your waistline — in as little as 20 minutes, three times a week.

HERMAN K. BEEBE

Shreveport, La.
Losses Caused: $30 million.
Ordered to Repay: $375,000.
Amount Repaid: Unknown.
Time Served: 19 months.

In 1987 Beebe was charged with a giant loan fraud involving losses of more than $30 million from 16 financial institutions. Beebe cut a deal with prosecutors agreeing to plead guilty to two counts of bank fraud that would expose him to 10 years in prison. He was sentenced in 1988 to one year and one day. That one day was no accident. Under Federal law, any sentence of less than a year has to be served in full while sentences over a year can be reduced for good behavior — which, in Beebe's case, it was. He served 10 months and was released in 1989. As part of his plea bargain he also got immunity from prosecution on any other bank fraud charges in the western district of Louisiana and Northern Texas.

Beebe was a multimillionaire whose company invested in motels, nursing homes, insurance companies and banks. Beebe wrapped himself in a web of political connections. He and his wife were guests at President Reagan's California ranch and Beebe was a longtime friend of Louisiana's Governor, Edwin W. Edwards. A close associate was Edmund M. Reggie, a retired Municipal Court judge, and now Senator Edward M. Kennedy's father-in-law. (Judge Reggie has also been convicted of S.& L. fraud. He remains free on appeal.)

Beebe built his empire on fraud and deception. In 1985 he was convicted of loan fraud for loans he had received from the Small Business Administration. He did no jail time and was ordered to pay $21,000 in fines.

Court records show he paid that fine, but the Justice Department has no record of whether he ever paid his $375,000 in court-ordered restitution, which was subsequently forgiven, in the bank fraud case. Joe Cage, the United States Attorney who prosecuted the case, says he thinks Beebe paid some — "a small amount" — of the restitution, but he doesn't know how much. Neither, it appears, does anyone else at the Justice Department.

Beebe's former probation officer, Billy Maples, says he cannot discuss the case or the status of fine and restitution repayment. "Parole files are not open to public disclosure," Maples says.

JOHN MOLINARO

Ramona, Calif.
Losses Caused: Approximately $30 million.
Ordered to Repay: $8.7 million.
Amount Repaid: 0.
Time Served: Three and a half years of a 12-year sentence; will be eligible for parole this year.

John Molinaro and his partner, Donald P. Mangano, were charged with defrauding approximately $30 million from their Ramona Savings and Loan. They purchased the S.& L. in 1984 and it was bled white two years later. After regulators closed his S.& L., Molinaro was caught trying to arrange for a passport under a false identity. A notebook found in his briefcase indicated that he was heading to the Caribbean to join approximately $3.5 million that he had stashed there earlier.

In 1990 Molinaro was found guilty of bank fraud and sentenced to 12 years in prison. He was ordered to repay $8.7 million in restitution.

In a letter to Federal District Judge David V. Kenyon, the F.D.I.C. said regulators

ticular method of taking a life. Sintef and Quigley have never been to the death house. Their goal is to insure that no one else goes there either.

On this day in early February they are especially concerned about Robert Wayne Sawyer, a 43-year-old mentally retarded man whose execution for the particularly gruesome murder of a young woman is a month away. Having exhausted all of his appeals, he can only be saved by an executive order from Gov. Edwin Edwards, and it looks unlikely. The two directors show the nun the news release they have written about the case, seeking her advice. Sister Prejean has one suggestion. "State the crime," she tells them. "Give it in all its heinousness. Mention the rape, the scalding, how she was set on fire. For one thing, the other side will say that we're not dealing with the victim if we don't. They want to match atrocity with atrocity. For another, we have to think of the victim's family when we put something like this out." Sintef and Quigley, who are novices, nod in agreement. They will rewrite the news release.

That decided, Sister Prejean tells them again about the death chamber, what it looks like now. "So here I am in this room," she says, "staring at this table, knowing Robert Sawyer is probably going to be on it soon. It's cushioned, so it's soft. There are five restraining straps — I counted. Everything in there is white and clean and antiseptic and waiting for Robert Sawyer." And then, more urgently, she says, "We have to bring this whole thing close to people, otherwise it's just an abstraction."

One person for whom Robert Sawyer's execution is not an abstraction is Vernon Harvey. Another is his wife, Elizabeth. They make it a point to attend all the executions at Angola, standing outside the gates, holding up hand-painted signs that make their position clear. Unlike Lloyd LeBlanc, who regrets the execution of his son's murderer, the Harveys remain steadfast in their belief that state-imposed death is right and just. "When someone takes a human life," Vernon Harvey says simply, "they should give theirs." Sister Prejean does not argue with him. It is her particular gift to know that her moral authority does not extend to this man and his grief. For their part, the Harveys know that she disagrees with them, but when she sits with them in their living room their disagreement does not matter. They have been through a lot together, and are bound by what they have seen, even if it has been from different sides of the room. The Harveys tell the nun that they are planning to attend Robert Sawyer's execution. She says she will be there, too.

"I bet they bring their R.V.," she says later. "They'll set up their lawn chairs at the gate and hold up their signs. I'll be across the road. At some point in the night I'll go over and visit with them. Then I'll cross over again and wait with the other sisters until it is over."

In fact, Sister Prejean is the only nun at the vigil. The Harveys are there, too, in their car, not their camper. The three of them spend a good part of the night talking. Just before midnight, Sister Prejean and a few others who have worked against the execution of Robert Sawyer gather together in a tight circle and begin to pray. They stay this way until they hear a guard say, "O.K., Robert Sawyer died at 12:09."

Minutes before, inside the death chamber, Sawyer, strapped to the gurney, turned his head toward the witness room where his spiritual adviser, Allyson Lamy, stood with her hand on the glass partition, reciting Psalm 23, "The Lord is my shepherd." She could see his lips move in concert with hers. She could see when he fell silent.

Outside, after the guard announces Sawyer's death, the crowd is subdued and no one cheers the way they did when Robert Lee Willie was killed. The Harveys pack up their placards, get in their car and drive away. Sister Prejean, standing by the gate, remarks that the signs are covered in plastic wrap as protection against the weather. "I guess they're intending to use them a lot." ■

LIFE AND TIMES/BY MAUREEN DOWD

Capital Ghosts

MY FAMILY LEARNED about the vicissitudes of politics early.

One morning in 1948, my brother, Michael, then a chubby-cheeked 13-year-old, showed up for his first day at work as a Senate page. He was proud and nervous in his brand new navy-blue suit, black tie and white shirt, just like the pages in "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington."

He walked into the august Senate chamber at 9:30 A.M. to find a lone senator, a powerful committee chairman, weaving about the floor, making a sloshing, clanking noise. The senator snapped his fingers and Michael came running over, discovering to his horror that the inebriated lawmaker had stepped into one of the water-filled brass spittoons and could not get his foot out. He kneeled in front of the senator and pulled off the spittoon, wondering what manner of job this was to be.

Washington is a city full of people who have no history here. The winners come through brashly and reinvent the town with each fresh political cycle. So it is comforting to have my family ghosts at hand.

My late father, a dashing black-haired, blue-eyed native of County Clare, Ireland, a soccer and step-dancing champion, enforced Prohibition here in the 20's as a D.C. police detective, pasting in his scrapbook clippings about his raids on "synthetic booze manufacturing plants" and "Chinese dope dens," as well as published poems on the evils of whisky. ("Now, reader, let me tell you/That this my sad disgrace/Was caused by bad whisky and now I sadly roam/Penniless, friendless, and that's why I have no home.")

There are sepia images of him getting a medal from Calvin Coolidge, walking beside Al Smith and guarding Franklin Roosevelt throwing out the first ball for the Senators in 1937. There is a photo of a neighbor, Pop Seymour, the last person still alive who was at Ford's Theater the night Lincoln was shot. A 5-year-old then, he remembered Lincoln bowing to the audience, then suddenly slumping.

And there's a picture of Agnes, one of my father's 17 siblings, who immigrated before World War I and worked as a maid for a Senator Gore — a distant relation to the Vice President — but was fired after she shoved a child off her lap who bit her while she was trying to read him a story. Knowing our aunt's temper, we sided with the Gores.

I covered Oliver North's bravura performance in the 1987 Iran-contra hearings in the same Caucus Room where my father, in charge of Senate security, had guarded Joe McCarthy in 1954 and had watched over the colorful Kefauver crime hearings in 1951. There, he enjoyed a brief celebrity on all three networks when he was asked to remove from the witness stand a recalcitrant mobster named Jake (Greasy Thumbs) Guzic and did so with his usual flair, rumbling, "All right, Big Shot, let's go."

When I sit in the House spectators' gallery to listen to a floor debate, I'm in the same spot where my father helped capture the Puerto Rican nationalists who opened fire on March 1, 1954, wounding five members of Congress.

LATELY, I HAVE BEEN COVERING THE EARnest freshmen in Congress, whose idea of a fun evening is a nice long argument about seniority rules. As kids working in the Senate during the late 40's and 50's, my older brothers, Michael and Martin, saw a more rakish slice of Washington history.

There was one famous Southern Democratic senator in those days who tipped the pages an extra 10 cents a day to deal with the constant calls of his jealous wife to the cloak room, screaming: "I know he's with that woman!"

There was Senator John Kennedy, whom my brothers remember as aloof, nonchalant. Once, when a storm threatened, Martin was sent to the floor to ask the Senator if he wanted the top of his (always) illegally parked new red and white 1954 Chevrolet convertible put up.

"I'm not worried about it," Kennedy replied.

When his bride, Jackie, came to visit, Kennedy asked Martin, a Democratic page, to take her up to the gallery. He always put her in a section up front, specially designated by the mischievous Republican pages so they could get a good look at the legs of the most attractive Senate wives.

Unlike Kennedy, the unmagical Richard Nixon had to try harder to impress. Once, with Nixon as a passenger, Michael was nervously jockeying the controls of an elevator, trying to get it level with the ground. It was the kind of performance that could get an operator fired by Lyndon Johnson. But Nixon simply offered to jump the foot to the ground, and then took the controls himself, murmuring: "Here, son, let me do that."

Prescott Bush, George Bush's father, represented Connecticut in those years, and the pages admired him as a Hollywood image of a senator. Senator Bush would sometimes snitch one of the Hershey's chocolate almond bars that John Williams of Delaware kept in his desk for the pages and then grin with an upper lip stained with chocolate as Williams made a show of "catching" him.

Our family even had its own New Deal version of the Cinderella fable. It featured my first cousin, Margaret, a dimpled, green-eyed Grace Kelly type who was considered one of the most beautiful women in town. One day in 1933, she was called out of the stenographers' pool at the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to take dictation from Thomas Corcoran, one of the young Harvard hotshots recruited by Felix Frankfurter to make up Franklin Roosevelt's brain trust. Known as "the slave driver," Corcoran had already gone through a slew of stenographers. "You're Irish, too," Margaret was told. "Maybe you can handle him."

Corcoran began dictating fast, with a cigar in his mouth. "Take that cigar out of your mouth or I won't take dictation from you," she said, with all the spunk of a Preston Sturges heroine.

He took the cigar out of his mouth and he took Margaret out of the typing pool, and for the next seven years she helped him as he helped Roosevelt remake government. She often went with "Tommy the Cork" to the White House, where he sang ballads to the President. Although F.D.R. and Frankfurter liked Margaret, they thought their protégé should marry a wealthy woman who could bankroll a political career for him. But he married his Peggy and got rich on his own.

For everyone else, Washington is like Oz, a place associated with big events and abstract ideas. But for those of us born here, there is a secret city within Oz. For me, the Capitol is not just a famous building; it's where my mother and I picked up my father from work. Georgia Avenue, the mostly black neighborhood Bill Clinton visited as a populist gesture when he moved here, is the street I grew up on. The Lincoln Memorial is where we went on cheap dates. Such shards of old history haunt me as I record new history, and my family ghosts make solid company in this capital of transience. ■

Canada Québec

History, haute cuisine, nightlife and sports...friendly Québec is all this and more.

For the American traveller, Québec offers all the adventure and excitement of a foreign vacation with all the comfort and closeness of home.

The heart, style and hospitality of Québec are all French. The outlook is dynamically North American. It's a dual-language community that makes the joy of life a way of life. In so many different and interesting ways, Québec is a celebration of individuality.

From the moment you arrive, you'll be dazzled by a never-ending list of things to do and see. Your visit will take you on many journeys.

Wander or take a horse-drawn calèche along narrow, cobblestoned streets past lovingly restored buildings and monuments. Here, you can turn the pages of history back to the 17th century.

Sip on a glass of wine and make new friends at an outdoor café, or dine haute cuisine at some of the finest restaurants and hotels outside of Europe.

Take a shopping tour through stores and boutiques where your choice includes everything from native crafts to Gucci and Cartier.

Industry, Science and Technology Canada

Tourisme Québec

Then, as the sun goes down, see the cities of Québec dress up in their glittering finery. A different kind of rhythm in the air invites you to a symphony, the opera, a jazz concert or an endless selection of nightclubs and theatres.

As your journey continues, stop at a charming country inn or resort. Our unspoiled rivers and lakes contain 16% of the world's fresh water. Here, you can relax in the sun and enjoy every kind of sport and recreation you and your family can imagine.

GREATER QUÉBEC AREA
Une Histoire d'amour

Just north of Montréal is a true island city offering a wealth of treasures and delightful finds for the modern vacationer.

Laval's proximity to both Montréal and the Laurentian Mountains makes it an ideal touring base. But Laval is a great vacation destination in its own right for all kinds of reasons: • Sports With three top-quality golf courses, plus boating, cycling, horseback riding and racket sports, Laval is an active people's place. • Nature areas Commune with nature on a canoe trip in the magnificent Parc de la Rivière des Mille-Îles (Thousand Islands River Park) or visit the Centre de la nature, with its farm animals, nurseries, picnic areas and artisans' village.

• Restaurants and historical areas Laval has, not surprisingly, an excellent selection of interesting restaurants, mostly in charming historic areas.

• Shopping Laval is a treasure island for shoppers, too, with four giant shopping centres, specialty boutiques and flea markets.

• Affordable hotels Laval's hotels offer great value, with room rates low by North American standards. The principal hotels are:

Hôtel des Gouverneurs de Laval. From $62. Tel.: 1 800 463-2820.

Journey's End Motel & Suites. From $61.88. Tel.: 1 800 668-4200.

Le Châteauneuf Laval. From $54. Tel. (collect): (514) 681-9000.

Sheraton Inn Laval. From $62. Tel.: 1 800 325-3535.

Travelodge Hotel. From $59. Tel.: 1 800 255-3050.

All rates are per night, per room, double occupancy, in Canadian dollars, plus taxes. Rates are valid from May 1 through September 6, 1993 and represent the lowest rates during this period on a limited number of rooms, when available.

They See America Rolling

DAN YAC CARMO

By Francis X. Clines

IN their separate careerings in time among American epiphanies, Walt Whitman and Jack Kerouac went beyond self-concoction to achieve an originality that made it all look easy: hit the road, get to the core, bang us in the heart with words that access the routine beauty and pain of daily life. Their work remains so readable and so indelibly American that it's no wonder that fresh attempts at wandering the nation and mapping its presumptive soul go forward with the inevitability of book advances.

Lately, a formula seems to be overtaking much of the wandering. It often features a narrator using the internal combustion engine as Muse, with highway subbing for plot line, and dialogue bites from grizzled, terse denizens as American chorus. The exercise seems preoccupied with climacteric more than climax. For it often involves a restless, mid-something male deciding he must go off alone in America driving his favorite stripped-down or optioned-up vehicle — generically, a 19-ought-something four-cylinder Testosterone will do, with a pint of Anomie stashed in the glove compartment — and searching for at least that minimum of surprise and originality to fulfill a book contract, with maybe a fender-dent of transcendence thrown into the bargain.

Francis X. Clines is a correspondent for The New York Times who traveled about America last year on political assignment.

The genre is no replacement for the lost American novel, at least not yet. But a reader does begin itching for a clearer line between uncanny reportage and not-so-creative fiction, considering how some of the latest examples pack in long coils of conversation in folksy contracted dialects that would seem too complex to be totally retrieved from the memory of a truly guileless wanderer. Contrarily, some of the better writing includes perfectly realized fragments of lives so burnished and broken that Flannery O'Connor's peacocks might be set to preening with envy.

Then again, there is Andrei Codrescu, a naturalized American and the most American writer of all in the current offerings of motorized searchers. Mr. Codrescu, a poet who is best known as an essayist on National Public Radio, takes this drive-time script and turns it inside out into a fine trick bag of wit, discovery and self-deprecation in a book badly titled "Road Scholar: Coast to Coast Late in the Century."

From the outset, he is smart enough to anticipate the main pothole in driving a 1968 red Cadillac and retracing his own racy immigrant roots (he was born in Romania and came to the United States in the 1960's) through the locales of Hippiedom. "I expected to find

"In his five previous novels Ernest Gaines has made the smallest truths, the everyday sorrows and hard choices, add up to moments of pure illumination. And here he does it again, brighter than ever ... His blunt language has the sway of poetry."
—SUZANNE FREEMAN, USA Today

"His first novel in a decade may be his crowning achievement."

A major new novel by the author of The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman

Ernest J. Gaines

A LESSON BEFORE DYING

"Like Joyce in his early stories, Gaines is writing here about the action of grace in impossibly circumscribed lives...about moments of illumination and about what it means to be human...It's an all-too-rare event to discover a contemporary novel that moves us to such deep consideration of such essential questions...At the same time this is very much a novel of manners. Gaines has a remarkable ear for ordinary speech — and for the ways in which race, social class and social occasion affect language: the special dialects of family, of friendship, of love; the subtle and obvious distinctions between the way black people speak to each other and the way they talk to their white neighbors...A strongly felt and — in the best sense — ambitious novel."
—FRANCINE PROSE, Newsday

1948. Two young black men with almost nothing in common except color and geography meet in a small Louisiana town.
Jefferson, inarticulate and barely literate, is awaiting execution for a murder he did not commit. Grant Wiggins, sharply intelligent and university educated, who has reluctantly returned to teach in his home town, is pressed into the role of mentor to the prisoner. The piercing results of their encounter are told — brilliantly, movingly, memorably — in A Lesson Before Dying.

"A remarkable book
...Through stark prose and a measured pace, Lesson evokes the hushed dignity its central characters seek and the hardships they endure...As Grant struggles to embrace life, and Jefferson to accept death, a memorable lesson in confronting adversity unfolds."
—V.R. PETERSON, People

Writing "with a freshness of style and language, Gaines returns to Bayonne, La., the mythically real town that has been the wellspring and inspiration of his previous novels...the interplay between blacks and whites, the wary dance between the races...Clashes of culture, ties of blood—all are rendered perhaps as clearly and confidently as Faulkner celebrated the vagaries of Yoknapatawpha County...There are no pyrotechnics of expression, no bells and whistles and literary tricks. The fireworks are reserved for the characters, their lives and struggles in a world that still resonates, even in our century, with the echoes of the antebellum South...Gaines has crafted a quietly moving novel."
—MICHAEL E. ROSS, San Francisco Chronicle

"His most powerful and moving work since The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman."
—Kirkus Reviews

Good Enough for Her Mother's Mother's Mother

A SUITABLE BOY
By Vikram Seth.
1,349 pp. New York:
HarperCollins Publishers. $30.

By Robert Towers

THE Indian poet Vikram Seth's novel "A Suitable Boy" begins with a lavishly detailed set piece devoted to a Hindu wedding and, more than 1,300 pages later, ends with another. One might well see the book itself in terms of a coupling (an odd one), for Mr. Seth — known in America as the author of a well-received novel in verse, "The Golden Gate" — has joined an essentially tidy, Jane Austen-like main plot with an attempt to re-create the multitudinous life of post-British India on a scale unequaled since Salman Rushdie's "Midnight's Children." Apart from their predilection for vast and crowded canvases, however, it would be hard to imagine two writers less alike than the wikily inventive and ferociously satirical Mr. Rushdie and the amiable Mr. Seth, a sentimental "bourgeois" realist with a taste for scrupulous documentation.

This novel, which is set in the early 1950's, opens on a scene of triumph: Mrs. Rupa Mehra, a middle-aged widow of good family, has found a suitable boy for her elder daughter, Savita, and "the cream of Brahmpur society" is present to witness the performance of the Sanskrit marriage rites. It is true that her new son-in-law, Pran Kapoor, is darker than she would like and not in the best of health, but he is "a good, decent, cultured khatri boy" of 30. The term "khatri," as the reader will soon deduce, applies to the high caste to which both the Mehras and the Kapoors belong. The warmhearted, superstitious and excitable Mrs. Rupa Mehra can now focus her attention on her younger daughter, Lata. But the virginal Lata is dismayed at the thought of the nuptial night her sister must undergo and blurts out to her mother that she doesn't think she ever wants to get married. Mr. Seth continues:

"Mrs. Rupa Mehra was too wearied by the wedding, too exhausted by emotion, too softened by Sanskrit, too cumbered with congratulations, too overwrought, in short, to do anything but stare at Lata for 10 seconds. What on earth had got into the girl? What was good enough for her mother and her mother's mother and her mother's mother's mother should be good enough for her. Lata, though, had always been a difficult one, with a strange will of her own, quiet but unpredictable. ... But Mrs. Rupa Mehra too had a will, and she was determined to have her own way, even if she was under no illusions as to Lata's pliability."

This passage, which illustrates the conventionality of the novel's language and sentiment, sets into motion what will become the reader's main concern: will Lata submit to Mrs. Rupa Mehra's arrangements, or will she exercise that spirit of her own even if it means defying not only her mother but also the prohibitions of caste and religion? Three candidates eventually present themselves. One of them, a handsome cricket-playing fellow named Kabir, strongly attracts Lata, but he is a Muslim and therefore out of the question as far as her mother is concerned. Then there is Amit Chatterji, a poet and a member of a Calcutta Brahmin family related by marriage to the Mehras. And finally there is Haresh, a brisk young man determined to make a career for himself in the shoe-manufacturing industry.

But the marrying off of Lata provides only the main plot line, which often drops from sight for 50 pages at a time while Mr. Seth pursues one of his numerous, almost equally important subplots. These involve the Congress Party politician Mahesh Kapoor, who is the father of Pran and of another son, the indolent and troubled Maan; the Nawab Sahib of Baitar, an aristocratic Muslim zamindar, or landowner, and his son Firoz Khan, whose estates are likely to be expropriated under the Zamindari Abolition Act, sponsored by the Nawab's old friend Mahesh Kapoor; and the rich but somewhat feckless Chatterjis, one of whom, the selfish and adulterous Meenakshi, is married to Lata's snobbish older brother Arun. (Genealogical tables for each of these families are provided as a reader's aid in the front and back of the book.)

To me, the most moving of the subplots concerns the infatuation of Maan with an imperious Muslim singer-courtesan and his drunken stabbing of his dear friend (and, by implication, onetime lover) Firoz Khan, whose life he earlier saved during a Hindu-Muslim riot; here the suspense hangs on the question of whether Maan will have to stand trial (and a possible life sentence) for the almost fatal stabbing.

THE above barely begins to suggest the multitude of characters and events that throng "A Suitable Boy." Although Mr. Seth takes what might be called an avuncular interest in his characters, he seems more passionately concerned to offer his Western readers as thick — and as multilayered — a slice of Indian life in the 1950's as this huge novel can hold. The setting moves back and forth between the cities of Brahmpur (which is fictional) and Calcutta, with excursions to New Delhi, Kanpur and Lucknow and to a remote country village where Maan spends a month in exile. Each major setting is elaborately documented in terms of its social and demographic components, with the domestic routines of the various families lovingly recounted.

In Calcutta, where both the spirit and the customs of the recent British Raj still prevail some three or four years after independence, we join the frivolous Chatterjis at dinner in their Ballygunge mansion, go to cocktail parties given by British executives and to races at the Tollygunge Club.

In the city of Brahmpur, a state capital on the banks of the Ganges, we attend meetings of the legislative assembly and hearings in the high court, visit the university, listen to technically described performances of Indian classical music, venture into foul-smelling slums where the low-caste leatherworkers scrape the fat from rotting hides, follow the election campaign of Mahesh Kapoor, participate in the Hindu festivals of Holi and Ramlila and the Muslim celebration of Muharram.

It is the religious festivals that provide Mr. Seth with the occasion for his most striking displays of narrative energy. During the Pul Mela festival, as hundreds of thousands of pilgrims converge on Brahmpur to bathe in the Ganges at the time of the full moon, the pressure of the crowd trying to descend a ramp to the river produces a catastrophe:

"Some people at the edges of the ramp tried to slip through the bamboo barricades and scramble down to

'I Have the Feeling You're Laughing at Me'

"What is it like to write a novel?" asked Lata after a pause. "Don't you have to forget the 'I' or the 'one' ——?"

"I don't know exactly," said Amit. "This is my first novel, and I'm in the process of finding out. At the moment it feels like a banyan tree."

"I see," said Lata, though she didn't.

"What I mean is," continued Amit, "it sprouts, and grows, and spreads, and drops down branches that become trunks or intertwine with other branches. Sometimes branches die. Sometimes the main trunk dies, and the structure is held up by the supporting trunks. When you go to the Botanical Garden you'll see what I mean. It has its own life — but so do the snakes and birds and bees and lizards and termites that live in it and on it and off it. But then it's also like the Ganges in its upper, middle and lower courses — including its delta — of course."

"Of course," said Lata.

"I have the feeling," said Amit, "that you're laughing at me."

"How far have you got so far with writing it?" she said.

"I'm about a third of the way."

"And aren't I wasting your time?"

"No."

"It's about the Bengal famine, isn't it?"

"Yes."

"Do you have any memory of the famine yourself?"

"I do. I remember it only too well. It was only eight years ago." He paused. "I was somewhat active in student politics then. But do you know, we had a dog even then, and fed it well." He looked distressed.

"Does a writer have to feel strongly about what he writes?" asked Lata.

"I haven't the least idea," said Amit. "Sometimes I write best about the things I care about least. But even that's not a consistent rule."

"So do you just flounder and hope?"

"No, no, not exactly." From "A Suitable Boy."

The Dance of DECEPTION

PRETENDING AND TRUTH-TELLING IN WOMEN'S LIVES

No matter why we lie or to whom, Dr. Harriet Goldhor Lerner, a leading voice in psychology and feminism, dares us to take a closer look.

We are all affected by faking and lying, by silence and secrecy, by pretending and self-deception, and by brave but misguided efforts to tell the truth. Whether the subject is family secrets or sexual faking, the struggle toward truth-telling is at the center of our deepest longings for intimacy, authenticity, and self-regard. In her bold new book, Dr. Lerner challenges women, as well as men, to rethink the ways that we engage in deception and she teaches us how to widen the path to truth-telling—a subject that is at the heart of who we are in the world and what kind of world we live in.

"Certain books a woman can't afford to miss. Such a one is The Dance of Deception... Empathetic and supportive...Lerner promotes the notion that truth is not simply an ideal to be pursued—it's also a tool for managing a happier life." —New Woman

"Stunning in its impact... This is a book to be read and re-read as we absorb its complex implications for changing the nature of our most intimate relationships." —Betty Carter, Director, Family Institute of Westchester

"The best of the author's "dance" trilogy... A remarkable, beautifully written book, illuminating ways for women to find integrity, courage and voice in a world that rewards female silence and pretense." —Carol Tavris, author of The Mismeasure of Woman

"There's not one false note in this brilliant and radical investigation of what we conceal from ourselves and others—and why it matters." —Holly Near

"We owe a great debt of gratitude to Harriet Lerner...The Dance of Deception guides us into the long-sought-after new world into which women are free to trust their own perceptions, revel in their own individuality and rejoice in an unexpurgated definition of themselves." —Peggy Papp, author The Process of Change

"Thank you, Dr. Lerner...I've always thought of myself as a truth-teller, but Dr. Lerner's book shows us that there are deeper levels of deception. If I can learn to tell the truth on those levels, it will enrich my life immeasurably." —Jill Eikenberry

How Pappy Did Away With Papa

I KILLED HEMINGWAY
By William McCranor Henderson. 313 pp. New York: A Thomas Dunne Book/ St. Martin's Press. $18.95.

By Robert Grudin

TWO divergent images of the writer have long battled each other in the Western mind. One is of a bold, dignified, authentic creator, a maker who can shape language into original and lasting form. The other is of an imitator, a hack, a hanger-on who earns scraps and crumbs from society by aping it, flattering it and clowning for it. These opposed views have had formidable proponents: Horace vaunted heroically that he had forged a literary monument "more enduring than bronze," while Shakespeare lamented having sold himself cheap and made himself "a motley to the view."

The dichotomy is equally relevant today. In the satirical novel "I Killed Hemingway," William McCranor Henderson, the author of the novel "Stark Raving Elvis," has taken these two positions and juxtaposed them so tellingly that his reader will feel not only their raw conflict but also their profound complementarity.

Mr. Henderson's story is complex, amusing and palpably symbolic. Elliot McGuire, the hero and narrator, is a fortyish "as told to" biographer with a formidable array of insecurities, a yen for booze and a preposterous New Age theory called LifeForms. Elliot has an unhappy past: a budding Hemingway scholar, he ruined his career long ago by getting drunk and making an outrageous toast at the annual Hemingway Dinner. His life takes an unexpected turn when his publisher sends him to Key West to evaluate an autobiographical manuscript by Eric (Pappy) Markham, a 93-year-old eccentric who claims to have murdered Ernest Hemingway.

Elliot meets Pappy and is enthralled. Over a series of alcoholic and often hilarious séances, the old man's oral text grows into a masterpiece of revisionism, a bawdy, brawling remake of the Paris years that features Pappy himself as hero. As the youthful Ricky Markham, Pappy outfights, outwrites and outwomanizes Hemingway, becoming in the process a mega-Hemingway of Paul Bunyanesque stature. He teaches writing to the slow-learning Hem, only to have Hem turn coat, steal his work and publish it as his own. Pappy's long-delayed revenge for these and other grave offenses is a shotgun blast delivered at Hemingway's Idaho retreat and made to look like suicide.

Elliot's response to these avowals is ambivalent. Their outlandishness is counterbalanced by the vitality of their presentation (Pappy talks better than Elliot can write). They may be egregious lies, but does that really make a difference? Did Hemingway always tell the truth about his past? And what's "truth" anyway? Don't we, à la Heidegger, create a new reality every time we make a statement? These musings are enhanced by Pappy's charismatic influence. His words convey an authenticity, a spiritual reality that makes the self-questioning Elliot appear to be, by comparison, a mere shadow. Falstaffian hell raiser, wellspring of mischievous authority and psychosexual energy, Pappy gradually moves onto the paternal dais vacated by Elliot's own father and Papa Hemingway himself.

An amusing variety of events and characters explores related themes. Elliot's visit to Key West coincides with a Hemingway look-alike contest in which scores of ruddy, white-bearded coots in safari jackets vie with one another in imitation of the real thing. Elliot's friend Yugo is the host of a popular talk show on which the wildest fictions are accepted as simple truth. Male authenticity and authority, as represented by sexual potency, become loaded issues when Elliot must compare his own inconsistent performance with that of Pappy, whose male member is so large and valorous that it has been nicknamed Roscoe and praised by generations of women. Elliot's LifeForms philosophy is ersatz self-help based on an arbitrary revision of one's own future biography. Using these elements and others like them, Mr. Henderson ponders two ancient questions — "What is reality?" and "What is a real man?" — in such a way that each illuminates the other.

Are these questions answered? Not before the plot thickens. Elliot, we learn, feels that he himself has killed Hemingway, by writing him an angry letter three days before the author's suicide. For reasons that the reader will discover, Elliot also feels obliged to murder Pappy. Elements of filial guilt and revenge suggest a Freudian dimension in which it would seem that paternal authority, either real or remembered, exerts a stranglehold on male creativity. Must all males kill Papa, if only figuratively, in order to achieve valid identity?

Mr. Henderson's edifying response to all these questions evolves in the disorderly and touching events that conclude the novel. Elliot's final confrontations with Pappy and with his own internal demons carry a message of self-discovery that operates on both psychological and literary levels. Creator and clown, truth and falsehood, parent and child, are inseparable duos, common to all adult minds, that will not release their grip on us until they are acknowledged and forgiven. □

THE PEOPLE V. CLARENCE DARROW
The Bribery Trial of America's Greatest Lawyer. By Geoffrey Cowan. Illustrated. 546 pp. New York: Times Books/Random House. $27.50.

By Paul Avrich

THE bombing of the World Trade Center was by no means a unique example of political terrorism; since the late 19th century, when the notorious Haymarket bomb was thrown in Chicago, the use of explosives to redress social and political grievances has run like a scarlet thread through American history. In July 1916, before the United States entered World War I, a bomb went off during a patriotic parade in San Francisco, killing 10 bystanders and wounding 40. Four years later came a more deadly attack, when a bomb planted in a wagon exploded on Wall Street, killing 33 people. And these bombings were only the most dramatic. There were hundreds of others, in cities throughout the country, causing death, physical injury and destruction of property.

One such bombing, seldom remembered today, forms the background of Geoffrey Cowan's book "The People v. Clarence Darrow." At 1 A.M. on Oct. 1, 1910, an explosion wrecked the building of The Los Angeles Times, an aggressively antiunion newspaper. The blast, which killed 20 people and caused $500,000 worth of damage, was followed by the discovery of unexploded bombs at the homes of Harrison Gray Otis, the publisher of The Times, and Felix Zeehandelaar, the secretary of the Merchants and Manufacturers Association.

Paul Avrich is the Distinguished Professor of History at Queens College. His most recent book is "Sacco and Vanzetti: The Anarchist Background."

SECURITY PACIFIC COLLECTION/LA PUBLIC LIBRARY/FROM "THE PEOPLE V. CLARENCE DARROW"

Clarence Darrow on the stand as a defendant, 1912.

Otis, an unyielding opponent of labor, had been fighting tooth and nail for two decades to keep unions out of Los Angeles. As Mr. Cowan — a lawyer and the author of "See No Evil: The Backstage Battle Over Sex and Violence on Television" — recounts, his efforts had been largely successful. In early 1910, however, the American Federation of Labor began an all-out campaign to organize the city's workers. A rash of strikes broke out. Fistfights and skirmishes took place. Strikebreakers were beaten by union men and pickets attacked by the police.

It was at the height of this bitter struggle, as Mr. Cowan reports, that the blast at The Times occurred. William J. Burns, the country's most famous detective, was hired to track down the perpetrators. He noted a similarity between the Los Angeles explosion and a series of dynamitings carried out elsewhere in the country against nonunion employers. His suspicions fell on the International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers, which had its headquarters in Indianapolis. In April 1911, John J. McNamara, the secretary-treasurer of the union, along with his brother James and an associate named Ortie McManigal, were secretly arrested — kidnapped, according to their supporters — and spirited to Los Angeles. McManigal, cooperating with the investigation, named James McNamara as the dynamiter of The Times and John as the brains behind the scheme.

Spokesmen for organized labor and for radical movements scornfully rejected McManigal's story. Convinced of the McNamaras' innocence, they raised the cry of a capitalist frame-up, a conspiracy of the Los Angeles plutocracy to humble organized labor. Eugene V. Debs claimed that Otis and his cronies at the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association had engineered the blast themselves, with a view toward discrediting the unions. Samuel Gompers, the president of the American Federation of Labor, visited the McNamaras in jail, heard them swear their innocence and undertook to raise a defense fund of more than a quarter of a

THE NEW COLD WAR?
Religious Nationalism Confronts the Secular State.
By Mark Juergensmeyer.
293 pp. Berkeley:
University of California Press. $25.

By Paul Johnson

THE self-destruction of the Mount Carmel compound near Waco, Tex., and the mass suicide at Jonestown, Guyana, in 1978, evoke mixed feelings of pity, horror and contempt. There is not much new about them, however. David Koresh's belief that Armageddon was coming was shared by the Qumran community near the Dead Sea, whose "War Scroll," a training manual preparing them for a battle of extinction that eventually came in A.D. 66-70, has survived, and very grim it is. Equally, the Jonestown massacre was foreshadowed by the epic of Masada in A.D. 72, in which 960 pious Jews, rather than surrender to the Romans, committed suicide.

In his book "The New Cold War? Religious Nationalism Confronts the Secular State," Mark Juergensmeyer does not ask the question: Why does behavior that seemed heroic in the first century A.D. now strike us as futile waste? He is more concerned with the wider implications of religious fundamentalism, though he dislikes the term, preferring religious nationalism. In particular he explores whether a confrontation between the zealots and Western secular societies will replace the old cold war as the prime fact of geopolitics.

Mr. Juergensmeyer has many qualifications for this inquiry, being dean of the School of Hawaiian, Asian and Pacific Studies and also a professor of religion and political science at the University of Hawaii. He has conducted interviews with religious leaders, both moderate and extreme, all over the world, and his source notes and bibliography testify to the mass of literature that has sprung up in this field, especially since the fall of Iran to Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

However, after reading his careful and dispassionate book — it is not possible to detect where the author's own sympathies lie or whether he has any — I am not convinced that this kind of comparative study of violently antisecular religious movements is particularly enlightening. It is true that Buddhist effervescence is one of the problems faced by Sri Lanka and Burma; true also that Hindu extremism is now a major factor in Indian politics, that the Sikhs are more troublesome than they used to be, that the Roman Catholic Church helped to overthrow Communist secularism in Eastern Europe and that liberation theologians would like to do the same to capitalism in Latin America.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Militant Hindus last December in Ayodhya, India, atop a mosque that had just been stormed by a mob of extremists.

In practice, however, the only religious phenomenon of geopolitical consequence is the revival of Muslim theocracy, whose impact has created what has been called an "arc of crisis" stretching from northwest Africa through southwest Europe, the Middle East and Central Asia down into Malaysia and the Philippines. I think the present involvement of the United States in Bosnia is a direct consequence of the Serbs' fear that they could become victims of an Islamic jihad.

Other types of religious activism do, of course, impinge on the world, and Mr. Juergensmeyer's interviews with their exponents reveal some points in common. There is angry contempt for many of the features of Western secularism (widely shared in the West, be it said), fear that westernization will extinguish ancient cultures and life styles, and a genuine preference for the spiritual over the material. But Buddhist and Sikh activists are unlikely to have anything but a marginal role in the societies where they flourish, and Catholics of both left and right are merely the extremes of a church that is now fundamentally moderate and accommodates itself to Western secularism (more's the pity, some feel). Even the Hindu nationalists, who are theoretically capable of taking over the Indian state, are merely reacting to what they see as a militant Muslim threat.

Islamic theocracy is the source of a different level of concern, for three reasons. The expanse of Islam is enormous and encompasses the world's largest oil reserves: as we have seen in Iraq, oil wealth can provide the opportunity for a Muslim state to buy its way into at least regional superpower status. Second, Islam, more than the other major religions, is by its origins a conquering creed that is peculiarly uncompromising in its attitude to infidels. Third, Islam has a continuous tradition of theocratic law, which to some extent has adjusted itself to modern needs. Islamic theocracies are not fantasies but realities, which have always existed and can be reestablished in Muslim countries that have been superficially secularized.

The West has valid reasons to become concerned if Islamic Iran is joined by other key states. Islamicization of Algeria might not matter so much, even if it infected Morocco and Tunisia. But for Egypt to fall to the extremists would be a different matter because of the intellectual leadership it tends to give to the Arab world, including the states of the Persian Gulf. Mr. Juergensmeyer writes well on the Egyptian religious nationalists and is in some ways reassuring: he finds them more reasonable than their Iranian counterparts and anxious to avoid what they see as Khomeini's mistakes. On the other hand, anyone who visits spectacularly overcrowded, poor and misgoverned Egypt cannot doubt the fragility of its secular regime and must tremble at what can easily happen there. Still more serious, of course, would be reversal of the secularization that Ataturk carried out in Turkey after World War I. A militant Turkish theocracy would cause problems in large areas of the former Soviet Union and the Balkans as well as the Middle East. But it is unlikely, one reason why it is scarcely touched on in his book.

In his last section Mr. Juergensmeyer asks, "Can we live with religious nationalism?" and gives a threefold answer. There are some characteristics — the tendency toward demagoguery and dictatorship and the contempt for human rights, for instance — we cannot and must not accept, and we must use the United Nations and other agencies to curb them. But he thinks that we ought to appreciate other aspects, notably "the notion that national societies are moral communities." His third point is that there is a grayish area in which secular and individual values conflict with religious communitarian values, and in which we have to reach accommodations, though he gloomily admits "there can ultimately be no true convergence between religious and secular political ideologies."

Clearly, Western policy makers have to take account of the reborn religious dimension in geopolitics, and Mr. Juergensmeyer's book serves as a useful introduction; it is something President Clinton will find it worth his while to read. But a global cold war between secularism and religious nationalism does not seem probable. It is worth remembering that Islam has experienced its spasms of zealotry before, and they all seem to have died a natural death from the disillusioning erosion of a material world. Unlike Christianity and Judaism, Islam has not passed through a period of Reformation or Enlightenment, with a consequent loss of pristine theocratic beliefs. But such a change is inevitable and is probably on its way already. What worries Mr. Juergensmeyer, and others, may not be a portent of a perilous future but the last eruption of an ancient way of looking at the world. Rabbi Meir Kahane, the Rev. Jim Jones, David Koresh and Ayatollah Khomeini are not so much harbingers as throwbacks. □

Paul Johnson's most recent book is "The Birth of the Modern: World Society 1815-1830." He is writing a history of the American people.

Theocracy Has Its Points

In 1986, Mark Juergensmeyer began writing what he intended to be a book on the Sikh separatist movement in India. Having lived in Punjab in the 1970's, he saw that "it was not a conflict between Sikhs and Hindus, but between Sikhs and the secular Indian Government." He was driven, he said in a telephone interview from his home in Honolulu, "to understand why what seemed to be a religious movement would have a secular target." He was struck by the similarity of the rhetoric of Sikh religious leaders; their foes, the Hindu nationalists; and Middle Eastern Muslim extremists: "They all talked about secular government as their enemy on a cosmic scale. And it struck me it was more than just an Indian religious issue; it was part of global politics." So, expanding his thesis, he traveled as far as Mongolia and Nicaragua, and wound up with "The Next Cold War? Religious Nationalism Confronts the Secular State."

NEIL PERLMAN/UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA PRESS

Mark Juergensmeyer.

Mr. Juergensmeyer feels that since Muslim societies are culturally and ethnically diverse, a global struggle between Islamic nationalists and the West is unlikely. But, he warns, they might be united by our failure to differentiate among various Islamic movements and "our continued hostility to religious nationalism." He condemns theocracies for constraining individual liberties, but thinks some criticisms by religious nationalists of the West's emphasis on self-interest may be justified. He said perhaps his past studies with the theologian Reinhold Niebuhr make him appreciate their "moral vision of social order and view of the virtue of public service as really quite profound."

CHIMNEY ROCK
By Charlie Smith.
388 pp. New York: Henry Holt & Company. $22.50.

By Jay Parini

"SOMEONE will create from your lives a story that tells / a truth you are waiting to hear," Charlie Smith writes in "The Palms," his most recent book of poems. One of those stories, along with its frightful truth, is contained in his new novel, "Chimney Rock," which is by far his wildest, strangest and most exhilarating piece of fiction.

The novel opens with breathless energy: "As we rose between walls of flowers into the terrible city I was speaking of Kate's death and of death in general when the driver said he could show me a place where six people died." The energy never fails. If anything, Mr. Smith heaps it on, fueling this human bonfire to its final apocalyptic boom.

"Chimney Rock" falls loosely into the category of Hollywood novel, but fans of Jackie Collins will stare blankly into these pages, recognizing nothing. Mr. Smith has taken Tinseltown as a metaphoric dreamscape, turning Los Angeles into a zone where our worst collective nightmares flourish. Everything is "dusty and vague," he writes: "The palm trees and the eucalyptus trees and the paloverde bushes beside the little Mexican urban rancheros were dusty, and the hookers on Soledad were dusty, and the pale linen and chrome buildings were dusty, and if you lifted in a balloon or a rocket ship you would see that the continent all the way to the isthmus was dusty."

Even as our voluble narrator, Will Blake, struts toward the auditorium where the Academy Awards ceremonies occur (he has been nominated for best actor), he looks up and sees nothing but the decay of nature: "A line of dying royal palms lifted their tousled tops against the side of a building." The city is "dry as tinder," with a "torch poised at the heart." The setting is ripe for conflagration, and Mr. Smith waits greedily with his boxful of matches.

Blake is at once the ultimate insider as well as the outsider — a man for all and no seasons. He believes he has learned from his brother Bobby, who died as a boy, "the amble and drift, the light touch, the passing glance, the slow retreat" that would get him "through the American bedlam without trouble." This is self-deluding, but like most of Mr. Smith's characters, Blake seems unable to distinguish between fantasy and reality. He is therefore lucky that his wife, the flamboyant actress Zebra Dunn (in real life she is called Kate), likes his delusional side. "This was why I loved her," Blake confesses, "because she wanted me to lie to her."

She sends him tantalizing homemade videos from far-flung places that lure him and his father (who is also in love with Kate) to the edge of madness. Meanwhile, his father (a famous film maker whose career is on the skids) attempts to dupe his son into collaborating on a bogus film project. "It's this deal I've been putting together for months," he tells Will, "this wonderful deal." The movie will take place in Mexico, and it will involve building, then blowing to smithereens, "a new world."

Will Blake, as narrator, is a natural poet, and he scours the ruined landscape of his life, past and present, with an eye for the sharply defining detail or intriguing metaphor. Once, for instance, he recalls seeing his movie-star mother in the act of seducing a 13-year-old girl named Veronica in a ramshackle guest cottage on a farm the family owned outside Los Angeles. "I dropped down from the window to my knees," says Blake. "I clutched myself in my arms. A bird called from the woods, a short metallic cry like silver striking silver. The sun was breaking through the overcast, throwing down cloaks of yellow silk onto the tops of the pines." The sordid sweetness of the imagery reinforces the lurid extravagance of the scene the boy has witnessed.

There is nothing new about a novel that underscores the lurid side of the film industry. From Nathanael West ("The Day of the Locust") to Gore Vidal ("Myra Breckinridge") and beyond, the sad or perverse aspects of Hollywood have been meat for the hungry novelist. But Charlie Smith moves beyond the genre here, appropriating the language and vision of Southern Gothic (the realm of his earlier three novels) to his own ends, invoking an arid emotional desert where nothing matters but the deal.

It's hard to say whether life imitates art or the other way around in "Chimney Rock." Even in ancient Thebes the appalling Blakes who dwell at the center of Mr. Smith's novel would have looked excessive. Oedipal couplings are mild beside what happens here: child molestations, patricide, sadomasochism, the works. The author jabs and punctures the elastic limits of what can be imagined; indeed, in the novel's terrifying and somewhat exhausting final chapters he goes way beyond what a squeamish reader (like me) can easily tolerate. Time and again I said to myself, "Charlie Smith can't do this." But one somehow accepts the wilder flights of this outrageous writer simply because the narrative voice in "Chimney Rock" is so lyrical.

A minor character in the novel — a sleazy deal maker who has known the actor since childhood — says to Will Blake, "You don't care about anything." He doesn't. He represents a complete absence of ethical consciousness, and it's against this vast internal void that Mr. Smith posits "this big stalagmite called Chimney Rock," which rises out of the otherwise horizontal prairie land of Nebraska. This memorable rock is recalled by Kate, who explains that it was a landmark for pioneers heading west, "a sign, a proof, that they were traveling correctly." It's a symbol of symbols that looms across the pages of this novel, its shadow a warning to all who would proceed toward Hollywood, this "world of dreams and promises."

The promises are never kept, of course: this is axiomatic of Mr. Smith's Hollywood, where the American dream has become a fin-de-siècle nightmare, a metaphorical holocaust embodied in the riot-torn city of Los Angeles and the willful self-destruction of the Blakes. I am not sure this novelist's truth is one that readers are especially "waiting to hear," as his poem says. But it's a truth that nobody who picks up "Chimney Rock" will ever forget. □

Leaving Herself Behind

When most people tell you a story, if it's a good story, you think they've picked up something in the experience, some knowledge or bit of worldly truth, and it's added to the life. . . . But this wasn't so with Kate. She had more stories than anyone I ever met, and she couldn't stop telling them. . . . But what amazed me was that instead of experience and the world's hackneyed truths piling up on her, they were shed. In each of the places she described, in the glassy lagoon in Truk, in Madagascar, where the lemurs leapt like drunken cats through the trees, on the dark interior roads of America, where men stood beside their cars shaking with sobs, she had left parts of herself, dropped bits of this or that feeling or temper until there was only this clean, rinsed light in her face, this thing I call wisdom. . . . On those palely lit mornings when . . . she would tell me some story, some tale perhaps about picking flowers in a wheat field in Saskatchewan, I would marvel at what had been stripped away, at how much life had been cast off, like bits of fur snagged in thorny brush, and how beautiful the loss had made her.

From "Chimney Rock."

Smelling the L.A. Air

Now that he has written a novel set in Hollywood and narrated by a movie star, will Charlie Smith ever be able to have lunch in that town again? Actually, Mr. Smith, who was raised in Georgia and lives in New York City, has only the smallest connection to that world. "I mean, I watch the Academy Awards now and then, just like everyone else," he said, with a light Southern accent, in a telephone interview from a hotel in San Francisco. He flew to Los Angeles once when he was halfway through the novel to find out "what color the soil was, what the air smelled like."

In fact, he first saw the image that triggered the novel in his accountant's New York office. "On her wall, she had one of these panoramic views of a desert mountain road in California," he recalled. "I was struck by what seemed to me the air of triumph and despair of that scene." He wanted to create characters for whom "looking at the world in that way would make sense."

"It's not about Hollywood," he insisted. "It's about the most important skirmishes that take place in the hearts of the protagonists." Mr. Smith, who is 45 years old, said he is particularly interested in exploring the limits of his characters' endurance: "I take the relationships in any book I write as close to the bottom as I can, down to bones and blood."

GRETCHEN MATTOX/HOLT
Charlie Smith.

"It's more challenging to try to imagine something authentically that I know nothing about, like Hollywood," he added. "This seems to me to be what a creative artist is supposed to be doing. I'm not reproducing reality. I follow dictates of the imagination. It's more interesting to put myself at as much risk as possible. But I mean, it's a book, it's not skydiving."

What Netanyahu Would Do

A PLACE AMONG THE NATIONS
Israel and the World.
By Benjamin Netanyahu.
467 pp. New York: Bantam Books. $24.95.

By Conor Cruise O'Brien

SINCE this book was written, its author has been elected leader of the Likud Party, and therefore could possibly be the future leader of Israel, perhaps as soon as the next elections. Benjamin Netanyahu became known to a wide international public, first as Israel's permanent representative to the United Nations in the 1980's and, more recently, as a Deputy Foreign Minister. His television appearances on behalf of Israel, during Saddam Hussein's Scud bombardments in the course of the Persian Gulf war, did much to raise his country in the estimation of the world. He has been the most effective of Israel's representatives on the world stage since the heyday of Abba Eban in the 1960's and 70's.

The dovish Mr. Eban and the hawkish Mr. Netanyahu offer contrasts in their styles as well as in their political philosophies, yet both have rendered great services to their country. And the language of political ornithology should not be taken too literally. It was the theoretically ultra-hawkish Menachem Begin who concluded Israel's first treaty with an Arab power, a treaty based on the return of Sinai to Egypt.

In "A Place Among the Nations," Mr. Netanyahu rules out the return of the Golan Heights to Syria. Yet it would not surprise me if, as Prime Minister of Israel, he were one day to reach an agreement with Syria closely comparable to Begin's treaty with Egypt: the Golan Heights, in the new pact, would play the same critical role Sinai did in the earlier one.

If so, such a treaty would by no means be a prelude to Israel's abandonment of Judea and Samaria (as Mr. Netanyahu consistently calls the territory known to Western diplomacy as the West Bank). Quite the contrary. If a peace with Syria is reached, it will, like the peace with Egypt, be intended to make Israeli control over Judea and Samaria — seen as essential to national survival — more secure.

Mr. Netanyahu is prepared (as Begin also was) to concede limited autonomy to the Arab populations of these areas (and also to the Arabs of Gaza). But autonomy could not work if Syria were bent on destabilizing it. For this reason, a statesman concerned about retaining control over Judea and Samaria would understand the need to sacrifice the Golan Heights. And I believe that Mr. Netanyahu, if called to power in Israel, will prove to be a statesman, though certainly not in terms of what the conventional wisdom of the West has generally recommended to Israel as appropriate in the line of statesmanship.

"A Place Among the Nations" is a powerful, lucidly argued polemic. Even Israelis and friends of Israel who generally dislike Likud will read this book with interest, and often with approbation. Very few Israeli spokesmen have ever understood the Arab arguments against Israel so well, or deployed counterarguments so skillfully. Mr. Netanyahu's familiarity with Arab sources is impressive, and he uses it to demonstrate that the Palestine Liberation Organization leadership remains hostile not merely to Israel's presence in the West Bank and Gaza but to its very existence. The P.L.O., Mr. Netanyahu says, still believes Israel to be a Western and infidel intrusion in a region that belongs of right to the Arabs and to Islam. As he puts it, "The Arabs do not hate the West because of Israel; they hate Israel because of the West." Obviously, several Arab leaders (especially after the collapse of the Soviet Union) are prepared to forget their hatred of the West, in their own perceived interests. But the hatred subsists among their subjects — as could be seen in Jordan during Desert Storm — and Western governments would do well to be mindful of Netanyahu's Law, as quoted above.

Being a polemic, "A Place Among the Nations" has its imperfections. For example, the Soviet contribution to Israel's establishment and survival in 1947 and 1948 is left out of Mr. Netanyahu's account. But such weaknesses (which are not central to his argument) do not invalidate the greater part of Mr. Netanyahu's book, whose strength consists in its analysis of Israel's present situation in relation to the Arab world and to the West.

Mr. Netanyahu is in the tradition of Vladimir Jabotinsky, the inspiration for Likud. He is in that tradition not just because he is the party's leader but because he shares important personal characteristics with Jabotinsky. Like Jabotinsky, and unlike both Begin and the former Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, Mr. Netanyahu is a formidable intellectual with a wide grasp of the international scene and a capacity to address international audiences. He recognizes that the governments of Israel — both Likud and Labor — have often blundered internationally, as the current Prime Minister, Yitzhak Rabin, did with the recent deportation of hundreds of Palestinians. Mr. Netanyahu's enhanced importance in Israel should improve the quality of the debate there.

Finally, "A Place Among the Nations" is often entertaining as well as instructive. Mr. Netanyahu is a neat hand with a comprehensive and apt political put-down, like his observation that "I'm not anti-Semitic, I'm just anti-Zionist" is the equivalent of "I'm not anti-American, I just think the United States shouldn't exist." □

Wobbly Lines in the Sand

TWIN PILLARS TO DESERT STORM
America's Flawed Vision in the Middle East From Nixon to Bush.
By Howard Teicher and Gayle Radley Teicher.
Illustrated. 418 pp. New York: William Morrow & Company. $23.

By Joseph E. Persico

HOWARD TEICHER, mad as hell and apparently not going to take it anymore, is caustic about United States Middle East policies. He is scornful of major figures he worked under, principally Ronald Reagan and Caspar W. Weinberger, and angry over his shabby treatment at the hands of a Government he served for 10 years. Mr. Teicher, a member of the National Security Council staff until 1987, registers his discontent in "Twin Pillars to Desert Storm," essentially an insider's notebook revealing how Middle East policy has been shaped, or misshaped, in the past 25 years.

Mr. Teicher's rise was meteoric, from graduate student intern who was taken on the State Department payroll as a clerk-typist in the Carter years to key participant in Middle East policy making in the Reagan White House by age 26.

The title of the book, written with his wife, Gayle Radley Teicher, an attorney in Washington and author of a study on covert actions, derives from this premise: Beginning with the Nixon-Kissinger era, American Middle East policy had two objectives, to keep the oil flowing and to block expanded Soviet influence in the region. The means to these ends was "twin pillars," a strategy of militarily supporting, initially, Saudi Arabia and Iran, which would then presumably do America's bidding. Twin pillars has proved a monumental flop, Mr. Teicher says, and "Operation Desert Storm was the inevitable result of America's flawed vision in the Middle East."

MICHAEL ZLATKOVICH

The book makes a convincing case. The Iran pillar collapsed early, with the fall of the Shah in 1979. Washington then began wooing an unlikely, unworthy and unreliable replacement pillar, Iraq, a country on America's terrorism blacklist and ruled by the brutal Saddam Hussein. Support for Iraq was stepped up during the Reagan era when it appeared that Iran might win the Iran-Iraq war, leaving the hostile Khomeini regime in control of the Persian Gulf and the flow of oil. Twin pillars led President George Bush to cozy up even closer to Mr. Hussein, convincing him that the United States would countenance his seizing of Kuwait.

But if the twin pillars are cracked, what is the alternative? Dependence on the region's oil, Mr. Teicher says, "is too great to permit the United States to rely on other countries to protect this vital interest." "For better or for worse," the book argues, "it is a fact that the people of the Middle East, Muslims, Jews and Christians alike, are impressed and persuaded by military action." Consequently, America must be prepared million dollars. "I am convinced," Gompers said of the brothers, "that they are the victims of the most diabolical plot ever hatched in our country."

Gompers spared no expense to save the McNamaras. To head their defense team he engaged the celebrated Clarence Darrow, promising to pay him a $50,000 retainer and to cover costs. Darrow, possessed of a deep and genuine sympathy for the underdog, had never lost a client to the executioner. To win an acquittal, Mr. Cowan claims, he was prepared to use every trick in the book, from kidnapping witnesses to fabricating evidence and tampering with the jury. But the case against his clients proved virtually airtight. Despairing of victory, Darrow struck a bargain with the prosecution. In return for an admission of guilt, the state agreed to withdraw its demand for the death penalty.

In the midst of the proceedings, accordingly, the McNamaras changed their plea to guilty, whereupon James was sentenced to life imprisonment and John to 15 years. This turn of events came as a shock to those who felt the brothers had been framed or unfairly prosecuted. Darrow, the hero of numerous court battles on behalf of labor, found himself under a cloud, accused of selling out his clients. Worse still, he himself was soon indicted for the attempted bribery of two jurors in the case.

In the most painful experience of his career, Darrow was twice compelled to stand trial by a prosecution utterly determined to convict him, once for each bribery charge. Guilty though he was, as Mr. Cowan makes clear, he nonetheless won acquittal in the first proceeding. The second trial (skimpily treated by Mr. Cowan) ended in a hung jury, and further legal action was dropped. Darrow at the age of 55 had weathered his most difficult storm. The cases that would gain him immortality — Leopold and Loeb, the Scopes "monkey" trial — lay ahead.

Such is the little-remembered story that fills the pages of Mr. Cowan's book. Based on a wide range of published and unpublished sources, it offers the most detailed and well-documented account to date both of the bombing of the Los Angeles Times building and of Darrow's conduct of the defense, shedding light on the great attorney's flawed character and on the expedients to which he resorted in pursuit of victory.

Why, then, does one close the book with a feeling of disappointment? For one thing, it contains too many errors, of both fact and interpretation (for example, John Peter Altgeld, the famous Illinois Governor, would have been surprised to see himself described as a radical and a Jew). For another, it is wordy. Metaphors flag, phrases are repeated and long quotations proliferate where judicious paraphrase would have sufficed. Careful editing could have shortened the text by a hundred pages without losing anything of value. Within "The People v. Clarence Darrow" there is a smaller but better book struggling to get out. □

They Helped Themselves

RIGHTEOUS DISCONTENT
The Women's Movement in the Black Baptist Church, 1880-1920.
By Evelyn Brooks Higginbotham.
Illustrated. 306 pp. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. $34.95.

By Suzanne Lebsock

EVELYN BROOKS HIGGINBOTHAM begins "Righteous Discontent: The Women's Movement in the Black Baptist Church, 1880-1920" by saying: "Much has been written about the importance of the black church in the social and political life of black people. Much less has been written about black women's importance in the life of the church." Her book, therefore, is an attempt "to rescue women from invisibility as historical actors in the drama of black empowerment."

In constructing her account, Ms. Higginbotham has taken an approach that is at once inspirational and something more complex. The times she is writing about certainly called for heroism: long regarded by historians as the nadir for freed black Americans, the period was marked by the systematic disfranchisement of black men, the establishment of legally mandated racial segregation, the development of "scientific" rationales for white racism and the practice of terrorism, in the forms of lynching and sexual assault.

In the face of all this, black Americans turned more than ever to religion — not for escape, insists Ms. Higginbotham, who teaches American history at the University of Pennsylvania, but to nurture their survival and organize resistance. This was in part a matter of building institutions, since black churches housed everything from employment bureaus and savings banks to day-care centers and health clinics. It was also a matter of developing and articulating group consciousness. Black Baptists were never of one mind, as controversies over the roles of women made plain, but the church did constitute, as she says, "a public sphere in which values and issues were aired, debated and disseminated throughout the larger black community."

None of this would have been the same without the women. "Righteous Discontent" concentrates on the largest of the black denominations, the National Baptist Convention U.S.A., which was founded in 1895 and by 1906 encompassed well over two million members — better than 60 percent of whom were women, who raised a great deal of the money on which both local churches and the national convention depended. Within the convention there was wide-ranging discussion of politics and social issues.

Women were responsible for the creation and maintenance of scores of church-related self-help institutions. In 1900 an autonomous national women's convention was organized, which in turn founded the National Training School in Washington — "an industrial school rather than a liberal arts college," committed to "professionalizing domestic service" and headed by the redoubtable Nannie Helen Burroughs. To all these endeavors, Baptist women brought a rising consciousness of women's place and potential. It was a great age for activist women, black and white, the country over. As one black women's club in Boston proclaimed, it was "the Woman's Era."

If the period was so important for women but simultaneously a low point for black Americans as a group, then how should we understand the apparently contradictory politics of that time? "Righteous Discontent" accentuates the positive, finding in the contradiction "a creative tension that both motivated and empowered black women to speak out." Ms. Higginbotham moves beyond the dichotomous thinking that has often short-circuited our attempts to understand the situation of black women. Implicit and sometimes explicit in much of our historical writing on women is a stubborn set of either-or questions: Which is more pernicious, race discrimination or sex discrimination? Which really matters, black identity or female identity, the black struggle or the women's struggle? — as though it were not possible to be both black and a woman in the same moment, as though the pursuit of solidarity among black people must inevitably conflict with feminism.

Ms. Higginbotham argues persuasively that black Baptist women were able to work with white women at the same time that they allied with black men. She devotes an entire chapter to the "unlikely sisterhood" created by black women, most of them from the South, and white Baptist women hailing from Northern missionary societies. She adds a second major argument about belief to her evidence about alliances. Black Baptist leaders like Virginia Broughton, Mary V. Cook and Lucy Wilmot Smith, she maintains, articulated a feminist theology, reinterpreting scripture to expand the possibilities for women.

This is likely to be a controversial assertion. But the point is Ms. Higginbotham's emphasis on the positive function of feminist thought for blacks as a people. "Instead of diminishing racial solidarity," she writes, "the rising gender consciousness of black women made possible the effective drive toward a national black Baptist community." Another way to undo the dichotomy of an either-or analysis is to put more than two ingredients in the pot. So to sex and race Ms. Higginbotham adds issues of status and class: the black women leaders exhorted their largely working-class constituents to adopt the values and manners of middle-class Victorians. Ms. Higginbotham is critical of their "politics of respectability" because in listing the sins of the unconverted, the Baptist leadership reinforced the already formidable stereotypes held by most whites. In several other areas, however, respectability was highly useful, "a powerful weapon of resistance to race and gender subordination," a weapon available to everyone, regardless of income.

"Righteous Discontent" sometimes risks frustrating the general reader by using the technical terms of post-modern literary theory. For some this will be too much language about language. These explicitly theoretical episodes, however, lead in the same direction as the more common-sensical prose that predominates; both take us beyond dead-end thinking. The result is an important, sophisticated and richly instructive book. □

A Lawyer in Shining Armor

FINAL ARGUMENT
By Clifford Irving.
333 pp. New York: Simon & Schuster. $22.

By Jean G. Zorn

EVERYBODY loves to hate lawyers. Witness the popularity of anti-lawyer jokes, several of which are quoted in "Final Argument," Clifford Irving's new novel. Since "Final Argument" is about lawyers, its anti-lawyer jokes are told by lawyers, which is not surprising. Nobody loves to hate lawyers more than lawyers themselves.

Then how do we explain novels like "Final Argument," in which the hero, the shining-armored knight riding out to set wrongs right, is a lawyer? Like Ted Jaffe, Mr. Irving's tarnished hero, we lawyers want our armor shiny again. Once upon a time, Ted Jaffe was a poorly paid but idealistic prosecutor. Now he is a successful corporate litigator, in dissatisfied midlife stasis. When he sets out to polish the armor by saving an innocent man from the electric chair, he is living a daydream shared by half the corporate lawyers in America. (The other half imagine that they'll write novels about lawyers.)

It won't be easy for Jaffe to save Darryl Morgan's life. Twelve years earlier, Morgan — young, black and angry — robbed the estate of a very rich developer. The very rich developer ended up dead, and his wife and son fingered Morgan, who had worked for them. It doesn't help that Jaffe was having an affair with the developer's sluttish wife — and that it was Jaffe who prosecuted Morgan. But Jaffe's biggest obstacle is the Florida legal system. The state's extraordinary willingness to execute black men leads one of Mr. Irving's characters to call it "the killer state."

Jaffe's interest in Morgan's case turns into a cause when Jaffe attends an execution at the state prison. Mr. Irving's description of that execution will turn you queasy, and it is all the more horrifying because he is describing an actual execution. On May 4, 1990, it took three jolts of high-voltage electricity to execute Jesse Tafero, and his suffering during the entire time was hideous. Mr. Irving carefully describes what it feels like — for the condemned man, for the horrified onlookers behind the glass curtain and for the men who work for the system that does this.

"Final Argument" wants the legal system to stop killing people, but fears it won't. Morgan's original lawyer had pursued vain appeals all the way to the United States Court of Appeals. "It's a beautiful old court," he tells Jaffe. "Gives you a feeling that justice might be lurking. But it's an illusion."

Mr. Irving offers a devastating critique of capital punishment. The author, whose previous novels include "Trial" and "The Losers," does his usual excellent job of providing insider touches that accurately reflect the cynicism and hope of the criminal bar. However, "Final Argument" wants its hero to storm the battlements, so it threatens the verisimilitude with a court hearing that could never happen, but in which Jaffe, his armor now burnished to a fare-thee-well, can play the lead in "Perry Mason" and "Father Knows Best" by turns. Only in fiction do lawyers' wives forgive them for sleeping with the star witness.

Do we need these histrionics? Maybe we do. Maybe that's what turns a tract into a page turner. Maybe that's what will make readers pick "Final Argument" off the racks of the airport bookstore. And maybe that's what it takes to get the message across. □

In Pursuit of 800 Readers

DELMORE SCHWARTZ AND JAMES LAUGHLIN
Selected Letters.
Edited by Robert Phillips.
382 pp. New York: W. W. Norton & Company. $29.95.

By Michael Milburn

ON a 1934 leave of absence from Harvard, James Laughlin visited Rapallo, Italy, where Ezra Pound urged him to divert his poetic ambitions from writing to publishing. Returning home, Laughlin used his allowance — his family owned Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation in Pittsburgh — to found the New Directions publishing house. Within a year the company had advertised its first book, by William Carlos Williams; this and subsequent volumes by writers like Pound, Nabokov, Djuna Barnes and Henry Miller established Laughlin as an indispensable discoverer and promoter of experimental literature.

During the first year of Laughlin's venture, a brief letter accompanying unsolicited contributions arrived from a 24-year-old poet and critic, Delmore Schwartz, who had recently abandoned graduate studies at Harvard. Laughlin recognized Schwartz's ability and commented, "I think you are going to be the American Auden." The public concurred; in 1938, New Directions published Schwartz's first book, "In Dreams Begin Responsibilities," to broad acclaim. Over the next 12 years the company would offer five more Schwartz titles, though none received the unanimous approval of that debut. By 1953, Schwartz's life and writing had begun to deteriorate. Plagued by alcohol and drug addiction, estranged from Laughlin and other devoted friends of his youth, he suffered a fatal heart attack in a Times Square hotel in 1966.

Schwartz's voice — witty, self-pitying, sarcastic and paranoid — dominates "Delmore Schwartz and James Laughlin," which reproduces 151 of his letters to Laughlin's mere 48. We accompany the poet through the publication of his volumes, moving with him to Massachusetts, where he and his first wife, Gertrude Buckman, ran the New Directions office in Cambridge. Schwartz bombards Laughlin with recommendations about which clients to court and which to unload. With bluntly sensible literary judgment, he sounds off on writers young and old, obscure and famous, canonical and controversial.

ROLLIE MCKENNA (SCHWARTZ); JOYCE DOPKEEN/THE NEW YORK TIMES (LAUGHLIN)

Delmore Schwartz, top, in 1961; James Laughlin in 1979.

In 1940 he writes that Pound "may be the biggest jackass in the world and working hard at getting even bigger, but he has the best ear for versification since Milton, and maybe the best ear that anyone ever had who used the English language. Poets will be learning their meters from Pound for the next 200 years, and it ought to be no small change to you that you are printing him."

As the correspondence proceeds, Schwartz grows plaintive and insecure. Early on he began addressing Laughlin as "Dear Jay," but a 1942 letter opens "Dear Mr. Laughlin," abruptly proposing to "communicate . . . in the cold objective style. This may or may not prevent you from remarking . . . that I am a drunkard." Similar mercurial changes of tone recur as Schwartz perceives slights from every side. Unfortunately, one can't gauge the merit of all such comments because so few of Laughlin's own letters appear here. An otherwise thorough introduction and preface by Robert Phillips, the literary executor of Schwartz's estate, who is the editor of this book, never account unequivocally for this imbalance. What one does read from Laughlin reveals his healthy regard for the pitfalls of literary publishing and friendship with Delmore Schwartz.

Here Laughlin writes from the family-owned ski lodge at Alta, Utah, in 1945: "It is true that things could be conducted a great deal more actively if I were there, but I prefer to be here, and prefer a mixed life to a single life. For what is life for but to enjoy it, and certainly in the scales of happiness a fine day in the bright sun and snow on one of our mountains here is of more worth than publishing a book by a dyspeptic author. . . . To take ND with utter seriousness would be to become soon a nervous wreck. . . .

"Draw what inferences you wish from this letter, dear Delmore, but believe, I beg you, in my undying interest in your quaintly abstracted soul and luminous literatures. And do not fear that I will not welcome you back to the fold if you have sad and disillusioning experiences in the city for which Babylon is too pleasant a name.

"However, one final word. Do not become a cheap writer. Keep up your standards. It is better to be read by 800 readers and be a good writer than be read by all the world and be Somerset Maugham."

For all their humor, pathos and quick-wittedness, these letters to Laughlin never convey the full wealth and originality of Schwartz's intelligence. He seems to have compartmentalized his genres; for each letter printed here, a contemporaneous poem, essay, journal entry, letter to another correspondent or even a chapter in James Atlas's excellent 1977 biography opens a further window onto the poet's genius.

Schwartz himself knew the futility of reducing his character to a single perspective: "It was pleasant to learn that you expected our correspondence to be read in the international salons and boudoirs of the future. Do you think they will be able to distinguish between the obfuscations, mystifications, efforts at humor and plain statements of fact? Will they recognize my prime feelings as a correspondent — the catacomb from which I write to you, seeking to secure some word from the real world, or at least news of the Far West — and sigh with compassion? Or will they just think that I am nasty, an overeager clown, gauche, awkward and bookish? Will they understand that I am always direct, open, friendly, simple and candid to the point of naïveté until the ways of the fiendish world infuriate me and I am forced to be devious, suspicious, calculating, not that it does me any good anyway?"

Such ominous contradictions, and Laughlin's affectionate navigation of them for almost 20 years, sustain a reader's interest in these pages. □

"Beautifully written, often funny, always moving... Occasionally a book —like Murakami's superb new collection of stories — jars your perceptions

...You look up from the pages and the scenery seems to have shifted slightly, as if something terrifying or hilarious or both had just knocked its orderly arrangements askew...Once we've seen the world through the eyes of Murakami, our own balance is likely to be thrown off, too, so remarkable is the originality of this author's vision."

—EDWARD HOWER, Chicago Tribune

"Although his characters struggle to find intimacy, Murakami manages to create it effortlessly. He may be the Wizard of Odd, but there's something about his storytelling that inspires intimacy. It's a particular kind of intimacy that can evolve between a reader and a book, unspoken and unexpected, familiar, satisfying and strange." —JANE MENDELSOHN, VLS dling of passions, which taken together with a weakening of the will, makes a man's passage from maturity to old age the time he is most dangerous to himself, as well as to others."

A more complex Saba story, but also in a minor key, is called "A Man." Scipio, a blocked painter, realizes that Maria, the woman who shares his life, has grown indifferent to him. She loves another painter, Nardi, and with Scipio's consent, goes off to live with him. One day Scipio meets Maria and Nardi on the street and asks Maria to sit for him so that he may finish her portrait. She consents. When the portrait is done, Maria suspects it may be a masterpiece and this evokes in her a sudden rush of tenderness, so that she offers to return to Scipio. Without explanation or even raising his voice, Scipio says, "No."

What is this about? The cost of hurt feelings? The complicated relation of art to life? The eternal problem of forgiveness? Or, what may seem more likely with Saba, the inescapability of disappointment? It is hard to say and perhaps there is no need to, since the story lives on its own, without benefit of exegesis, as a glance at life's troubles.

"The Stories and Recollections of Umberto Saba" is rounded out with a selection of Saba's "shortcuts," patches of prose reflection, and some personal memories. A writer of modest scope, Saba is nevertheless a real writer. There ought to be more translations of his work. Meanwhile, here, from a recently published volume of his poetry, "Thirty-one Poems," is "The Goat," the voice of his essential whispering, as translated by Felix Stefanile:

I talked to a goat, alone in the field
at the end of her rope.
Sated with nibbling, soaked from the rain, she was bleating.

That steady bleat
was brother to my pain.
At first I replied for the sport, and then because sorrow is forever,
and has one voice that is always the same;
and this is the voice I caught in the crying of that solitary goat:

goat of semitic look in whom I kept hearing the lamentation of all living things, and all bad luck. □

the ditches on either side. But last night's storm had made these steep slopes slippery, and the ditches themselves were filled with water. About a hundred beggars were sheltering by the side of one of the ditches. Many of them were cripples, some were blind. The injured pilgrims, gasping for breath and clawing for a foothold on the slope, now came tumbling down onto them. Some of the beggars were crushed to death, and some tried to flee into the water, which soon turned to a bloodied slush as more of those who were trapped on the ramp sought this, their only route of escape, and fell or slid onto the screaming people below."

Within 15 minutes more than a thousand people are dead.

THOUGH many pages of "A Suitable Boy" are devoted to religious rites, processions, myths and beliefs, Mr. Seth's own attitude toward these phenomena seems determinedly secular — as if one of his aims is to demystify India, to counteract the Western notion of wonder-working holy men and gurus of profound spirituality. The swamis and their devotees in the novel are presented in mildly comic terms. "It is rare," he writes, "for religious feeling to be entirely transcendent, and Hindus as much as anyone else, perhaps more so, are eager for terrestrial, not merely post-terrestrial, blessings. We want specific results . . . whether to insure the birth of a son or to find a suitable match for a daughter. We go to a temple to be blessed by our chosen deity before a journey, and have our account books sanctified by Kali or Saraswati."

What Mr. Seth does not play down is the tragic interweaving of religion and politics, the ancient rivalry between Hindu and Muslim, the undying suspicion and resentment that can be blown into flame at any moment by unscrupulous office-seekers or bigoted religious leaders. In this respect, as in so many others, Vikram Seth's re-creation of the India of 1950 provides an accurate preview of the India of today.

Is this vast novel, which confidently aspires to the panoramic sweep of 19th-century fiction, an important work of literary art? "A Suitable Boy" is a Book-of-the-Month Club selection; it has received extensive prepublication publicity and has, in England at least, inspired comparisons to "War and Peace" and "Middlemarch." Such claims are hyperbolic, to say the least. Mr. Seth's novel contains no Natashas or Pierres, no Dorothea Brookes or Lydgates. In his drive toward inclusiveness, he has sacrificed intensity. He does not stick with any one character long enough — even the most promising or interestingly troubled — or probe deeply enough to achieve the kind of impassioned empathy that renders a character unforgettable. Though he refers several times to Jane Austen's novels and seems to have modeled Mrs. Rupa Mehra to a considerable degree on Mrs. Bennet in "Pride and Prejudice," he settles for a genial, soft-edged treatment of this often foolish and intrusive woman and thus deprives her of the comic absurdity with which Austen endows her matchmaking mamma.

Similarly, Lata is a pleasant ingénue whose love for the unsuitable Kabir is made to seem hardly more profound than a schoolgirl's crush; she is no Lizzie Bennet. The other characters are conventionally conceived, well drawn and sufficiently interesting in their social and familial roles; none, I predict, will continue to haunt our memories. Despite a number of vigorously written scenes, the narrative as a whole is diffuse, often overwhelmed by long (and sometimes tedious) passages devoted to the processes involved in shoe manufacture or to verbatim campaign speeches or debates in the legislative assembly. In the end, "A Suitable Boy" succeeds less as a novel than as a richly detailed documentary focused upon a crucial era in the history of an endlessly fascinating country. □

Mr. Seth aims to join a tidy Jane Austen-like main plot with a re-creation of the multitudinous life of post-British India.

Good Boy in a Bad Crowd

THE KING OF CARDS
By Robert Ward.
324 pp. New York: Pocket Books. $20.

By Valerie Sayers

"I SEE you're a sentimental man," a psychiatrist tells Tommy Fallon, the protagonist of Robert Ward's fourth novel, "The King of Cards." He is indeed, and "sentimental" is the best word I can think of to describe his story.

Tommy Fallon is the only child of a miserable Baltimore family. "The King of Cards" opens when Tom returns to his Baltimore alma mater to receive an honorary doctorate, but the main action takes place in flashback to 1965, when he is a young student at Calvert College.

Running hard from the bad times at home, Tom idolizes one of his professors, Dr. Sylvester Spaulding, who reveals the glories of literature in general and Henry James in particular. But Dr. Spaulding's influence wanes when Jeremy Raines, the free-thinking iconoclastic king of cards, makes the scene. The cards in question are photo identification cards: Raines has seen the future, and the future is laminated. Jeremy Raines is the guiding spirit of a late-beatnik, early-hippie Baltimore commune, replete with illegal drugs, tall tales and an embosser in the basement. Raines persuades the innocent Tommy Fallon to join the card empire's great quest for economic and spiritual fulfillment.

Dr. Spaulding and the crowd of hipsters at Jeremy's place lead Tommy to agonize over his family. The biggest sorrow of his life is his father, a failed artist and civil servant who spends most of his time in the bathroom lancing his pimples. Tommy feels responsibility. "He had given up his art, spoiled his promise, primarily for me," he says. "And what was I? A self-conscious, stick-in-the-mud intellectual."

Tommy is given to such self-doubt. I would be tempted to describe him as cheesy even if he didn't offer up the image himself, when he imagines his father in a scene out of the old "Kraft Theater." "In these sterling melodramas," he says, "the father would at last see how he has maligned his sensitive son and would hold him in his arms as the scene faded and the melted cheese poured so warm and comforting down the screen."

Cheesiness becomes a problem in this narrative, too. Tommy is given to melodrama and recognizes his weakness. "What melodrama . . . what corn," he says of his thoughts, but that does not stop him from delivering up lines like: "I had to ride the Memory Train all the way down into the burned-out places that lay in waiting, the deserted train stations of the heart." He is also master of the cliché. "For a few seconds I could see nothing but brightly colored lights," he says after being kicked. Sometimes he even resorts to the word "cliché" inside a cliché: when he gives his commencement address, he falls "back on the old time-worn clichés."

Clichés are especially useful to him when describing women, whose body parts are their most memorable assets (even his mother's biggest moment comes in the Miss Kissable Lips contest). About his girlfriend, Val, he says: "God, she was as beautiful as some romantic cliché. Her skin was literally like alabaster." That "literally" makes me fear for the girl. But at least Val gets to tell her life story — briefly — and even if it's a heart tugger, it is more believable than the story of Sister Lulu, the ex-nun who has had a sexual encounter with her mother superior in the confessional. Nuns do not confess to nuns in the confessional "booth," as Mr. Ward calls it; they confess to priests. Editorial types somewhere down the line should have caught the mistake, even if they weren't concerned with bigger questions.

The bigger questions are both agonized over and glossed over in "The King of Cards." Though Tom is often the only one in the crowd who even considers the morality of a situation, he is not a great champion of morality. (Maybe I'm just prickly about his judgment because he says of a campus visit by Marianne Moore: "I couldn't wait for her to leave and head back to her iron lung or wherever it was she lived when they didn't drag her out in front of the public.") Tommy is the kind of boy who makes excuses for his old friend Bobby Murphy. "He was, I suppose, merely a thug. Still, when I thought of him I felt a deep tenderness and respect."

Tommy and Jeremy and the rest of the gang eventually get really fouled up with thugs, and bigger thugs than Bobby Murphy. But by the time

The iconoclastic hipster Jeremy has seen the future, and the future is laminated. He keeps an embosser in his basement.

Tommy brings himself to commit violence against a mobster who's trying to take over the card operation, there is not much moral impact to his startling act. The novel at this point reads like a novelization of a movie, all violence and quick action, and it is concluded with the ultimate sentimental trick: death upon death upon abandonment upon abandonment.

When I began reading "The King of Cards," Tommy Fallon's innocence and big-heartedness inclined me to forgive a lot, even some of the more bizarre plot twists. The comedy often does not work (it's always a bad sign when the characters have to laugh heartily at their own jokes), but Mr. Ward has a wonderful feel for his protagonist, who is, after all, a confused kid. I'm big on confused kids, and Robert Ward is a clever enough storyteller to gain himself a wide audience with Tommy Fallon's story. He keeps the narrative chugging; he creates some good characters; he even writes some lovely lyrical descriptions of Baltimore. But sentimentality is a dangerous thing. Once that cheese starts dripping, it's bound to make a mess. □

Valerie Sayers's latest novel is "Who Do You Love."

A TOUCHSTONE BOOK

"to use force judiciously when necessary." An example: as the Shah began to collapse, Mr. Teicher urged that "the sooner the United States undertook decisive military action the better." Apparently, America was to prop up by force a leader rejected by his own people. One has a sense that in Mr. Teicher's world other nations exist to fulfill America's interests.

Mr. Teicher is blistering toward Mr. Weinberger, the former Secretary of Defense, who emerges as a star pupil in the school that believes support of Israel explains all the United States' problems with the Arab world. Mr. Weinberger, Mr. Teicher says, unwisely chose to punish Israel for destroying the Iraqi nuclear reactor at Osirak in 1981 because the attack disturbed United States-Arab relations. He attributes the 1982 Lebanese Phalangist massacre of Palestinian civilians at the Sabra and Shatila camps to Mr. Weinberger's premature withdrawal of United States marines. Responsibility for the deaths in 1983 of 241 United States marines in the truck bombing of their Beirut barracks, Mr. Teicher says, "rests squarely on the shoulders" of Mr. Weinberger, along with Gen. John W. Vessey, then chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, for leaving the troops in an untenable position.

Mr. Teicher was equally appalled by President Reagan's lackadaisical leadership, which allowed the President's subordinates to ignore direct orders and do as they pleased: "Ronald Reagan's failure to exert decisive leadership would lead to America's humiliating defeat in Lebanon in 1984, the 1986 Iran Affair and the blind tilt toward Baghdad, the latter contributing directly to the 1990 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait." Thus is dismissed the President who supposedly restored America's prestige abroad.

Mr. Teicher's story vividly recalls the bad old days when virtually every friction around the world was inflated to fit the superpower rivalries of the cold war. "Twin Pillars to Desert Storm" describes United States diplomats trying to mediate a quarrel between Lebanon's Christians and its Druze tribesmen, hoping thus to defuse tensions between Syria and Israel so that their respective sponsors, the Soviet Union and the United States, would not be propelled to the nuclear brink. So much for any misplaced nostalgia for the relative stability of the old East-West stalemate.

As for Mr. Teicher's rocket rise, he flamed out over Iran-contra. He had been sent, behind the United States Ambassador's back, to put the arm on Israel for cash for the Nicaraguan contras, an act that won him the undying enmity of State Department careerists. He was ordered to accompany Robert C. McFarlane and Lieut. Col. Oliver L. North on that bizarre 1986 mission to Teheran in a plane full of Hawk missile parts, an incident that was to further tar him with the arms-for-hostages scandal. He was subsequently hounded by unfounded rumors that the F.B.I. was investigating him as a top Israeli spy. The book quotes a Wall Street Journal correspondent's description of him at the time: "He was young, tireless, committed and sometimes cocky. . . . As he rose through the ranks, his religion and his abrasiveness made him a catalyst for the ugly feud between Arabists and supporters of Israel in the U.S. Government." In the winter of 1987, at age 32, Howard Teicher was forced out of Government, a victim of the Reagan White House's scramble to contain the mushrooming Iran-contra scandal.

One of his early lessons, Mr. Teicher says, was the discovery that Middle East policy was not decided on the merits by dispassionate experts. Rather, it was produced by "the human dimension," concocted of the ambitions, jealousies and competing drives of individuals. Not a bad lesson for a young man, or anyone else, who aspires to play in the power games of nations. □

THE STORIES AND RECOLLECTIONS OF UMBERTO SABA

By Umberto Saba.
Translated by Estelle Gilson.
Illustrated. 222 pp. Riverdale-on-Hudson, N.Y.: The Sheep Meadow Press. $22.50.

By Irving Howe

LITERATURE has its singers, its shouters, its talkers. There is also a company of writers who might be called the whisperers, those who speak softly and use soft words, occasionally admitting into their pages a little touch of irony. Such a whisperer was Umberto Saba (1883-1957), an Italian writer little known in the United States but regarded as a major literary figure in his native land. After reading the few dozen of his poems that have been put into English and the short prose pieces that appear in "The Stories and Recollections of Umberto Saba," I would say that Saba was a superb poet and a good story writer.

He was born Umberto Poli in the city of Trieste, to a morose Jewish mother and a scamp of a gentile father. By the time of Umberto's birth, his father had abandoned the family; forever after his mother would refer to her wayward husband as "the murderer." It was in this gloomy atmosphere that Umberto grew up, nurturing in himself a taste for melancholy that would stay with him to the end. In his later years he had a few psychological crises that required sojourns in sanitariums. Nevertheless, he managed to write more than 600 poems as well as occasional short prose fictions. He said he took his pen name, Saba, from his old nursemaid, Sabar; it was a felicitous choice, since the word means grandfather in Hebrew, and his writing doesn't exactly bubble with youthful spirits.

The editor and translator of "Stories and Recollections," Estelle Gilson, has divided this thin volume into several parts. The first, labeled simply "The Jews" and dated 1910-12, contains a number of rather amiable sketches, fragile line drawings of Jewish life in Trieste. Here, if not quite cheerful, Saba writes with a mild nostalgia for a community long gone (there were nearly 5,000 Jews in Trieste during the years of his youth). Saba's friend, the Italian writer Carlo Levi, has described these Jewish sketches as presenting "a world of kings, of poorly clothed kings, whose pains and sorrows are . . . wrapped in affectionate irony, woven with patience and hope, and for all the misery of poverty, with the anxious certainty of being God's chosen."

Containing hardly any plots or substantial characterizations, the Jewish sketches resemble snapshots handed down by older generations, a little faded but still evoking a picturesque atmosphere. When I first read these sketches, I thought the ways of these Trieste Jews were quite distinctive. But then I corrected my mistake, coming to see that the traits we regard as characteristic of modern Jewish life — the authority of the maternal, the wish for independent livelihood, the half-acknowledged desire to break into the "outer" world — were as present among these obscure Trieste Jews as among those of the Bronx or Montreal or Odessa, all stemming from common roots.

One charming sketch, "A Hebrew Scholar," set in 1823, is centered on an actual person, the Hebraist Samuel David Luzzatto, who is seen strolling through Trieste with a few young companions. They talk about faith, mysticism, cabala and Spinoza. What seems at first a mere casual sketch turns out to be a keen study of the concerns troubling Jews in Luzzatto's time — and in our own time also.

The other sketches deal with common life among the Trieste Jews of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. In "Sofia and Leone Vita," a wizened old man and his middle-aged wife, both beyond the reach of romance, manage to hold together through a routine of shared obligations. Comes the Sabbath and they celebrate by taking naps and then, at sundown, reopening their store. Life slides along quietly, without drama or passion but with some tenderness. Out of respect for his characters Saba even smiles a little.

It is when we come to the main group of stories in this book, more substantial and pungent than the Jewish sketches, that we encounter Saba's best work in prose. He writes as a connoisseur of disappointment, not exactly of sadness but of the dryness of spirit that comes after sadness. Some of the stories dredge up dark memories and reflections, now and then relieved by a caustic kind of humor. These stories seem to me — am I just imagining this? — similar to the stories of the Italian master Luigi Pirandello, a writer also obsessed with the entanglements of personal relations.

Umberto Saba.

"Valeriano Rode" depicts a couple mired in daily life: a marriage gone dead, a shortage of money, exhausting work and the drainage of hope. Valeriano, the husband, grows more and more tyrannical at home, "for it was only there that he could act out his tragic unhappiness." And then comes a characteristic Saba sentence: "Perhaps his wasn't truly an illness so much as a crisis of old age, exacerbated by remorse about a life of failed hopes (though Valeriano himself couldn't have said what they were), and of that sudden rekin-

Science Fiction

By Gerald Jonas

There is a grandeur to the career of Isaac Asimov quite aside from his legendary productivity. Asimov, who died a year ago at the age of 72, published more than 450 books in his lifetime, most of them nonfiction. He was one of the great explainers of his day. Like a missionary sworn to spread the gospel of reason to the unenlightened, he helped introduce an entire generation to the insights of modern science, writing lucidly about everything from the mysteries of matter and energy to the mysteries of the human mind. While he occasionally dabbled in subjects outside his chosen field — the Bible, say, or the works of William Shakespeare — he took his self-imposed burden seriously.

No one knew better than Asimov how quickly books about science become obsolete. Even those written from a historical perspective have a relatively short half-life. Twice between 1964 and 1982, Asimov updated his comprehensive Biographical Encyclopedia of Science and Technology, revising and adding hundreds of entries; the 1982 edition offered a sampling of "The Lives and Achievements of 1,510 Great Scientists From Ancient Times to the Present Chronologically Arranged."

Because even the best science writing is soon overtaken by new discoveries, Asimov's reputation as a writer will likely rest on his more than 60 books of science fiction. By far his best known works — the longish story "Nightfall" and the original Foundation series — were first published when he was still in his 20's. Toward the end of his life, he began writing new stories that attempted to bring together the disparate universes of his early fiction in a single coherent epic of humanity's future. FORWARD THE FOUNDATION (Foundation/Doubleday, $23.50), the seventh and final volume in the series, is set on the imperial capital of Trantor; it tells of the events that gave rise to the two Foundations of Hari Seldon, father of the science of psychohistory.

Asimov's early Foundation stories pulsed with optimism; neither the young author nor his readers in the 1940's and 50's doubted that scientific principles, properly applied, could bring a new and better order to the 25 million habitable planets of the dying Galactic Empire. In "Forward the Foundation," Asimov writes from the point of view of the aging Seldon, a man of impressive achievements who is nevertheless burdened by intimations of inadequacy. While the work of psychohistory goes forward, Seldon worries about the increasingly unsafe streets of Trantor, a planetwide city where an old man, no matter how prominent, is in constant danger of being mugged.

According to an excerpt from the "Encyclopedia Galactica" that concludes this novel, Hari Seldon "died with the future he created unfolding all around him. . . ." In championing the creative interplay between reason and imagination, Isaac Asimov — a man who hated flying and spent most of his life in New York City, writing — shaped our future by telling us what we need to know in order to survive the present.

Gene Wolfe, whose multivolume series "The Book of the New Sun" was steeped in skepticism about the lessons of history, embarks on an ambitious new work with NIGHTSIDE THE LONG SUN (Tor/Tom Doherty, $21.95). The tenuous promise of redemption that drove the earlier series is here embodied in the young priest Patera Silk. Serving a pantheon of gods who have long been silent, he hears a whisper of revelation from a little-known deity called the Outsider; this experience changes his life and propels him toward even more troubling revelations about his world and its origins.

That world — known to Patera Silk and his neighbors as the Whorl — is actually a giant spaceship whose inhabitants have forgotten not only their mission but the very fact that they are journeying somewhere. This premise is not original to Mr. Wolfe; Robert Heinlein made memorable use of it in his short novel "Universe." But by focusing so closely on the details of life in the Whorl, Mr. Wolfe seduces the reader into sharing his protagonist's disorientation. When the gods begin to speak, the reader wonders if this is a justification of Patera Silk's faith — or the first step toward a bitter disillusionment, since some of the gods communicate through what the reader (but not Silk) recognizes as the remnants of a shipwide network of television screens.

It is very much to Mr. Wolfe's purpose that this question arises only at the end of the book, presumably to be confronted in later volumes of the promised tetralogy. The plot of "Nightside the Long Sun" concerns Patera Silk's desperate efforts to save his impoverished chapel and school from bankruptcy. A reluctant hero who is afraid to say no to destiny, the young priest makes an ideal guide to the unfolding puzzle of the Whorl. Sentence by sentence, Mr. Wolfe writes as well as anyone in science fiction today. He evokes the texture of another time and place with a blend of archaic vocabulary and futuristic science that manages at once to be both reassuring and disturbing. One of Patera Silk's colleagues is an ageless female android named Maytera Marble, whose nonhuman origins are apparent only to the close observer: "The soft skin had worn from the tips of her fingers long ago, leaving bare steel darkened like her thoughts by time, and polished by unending toil."

DREAM OF GLASS (Harcourt Brace, $21.95), by Jean Mark Gawron, is an engrossing philosophical novel about the interaction between artificial and human intelligence. The protagonist is a woman named Alexa Augustine, who is almost killed in an explosion. Rebuilt with the help of a supercomputer, she struggles to figure out who — or what — she has become.

A long time ago, H. G. Wells, the progenitor of modern science fiction, said that having odd things happen to odd people was one oddity too many; in most of Wells's "scientific romances," remarkable events impinge on Englishmen of stalwart ordinariness. But recent science fiction, encouraged by the success of William Gibson and other practitioners of cyberpunk, has piled on the oddities in an attempt to create speculative futures that can compete with an increasingly disjointed present.

Mr. Gawron, who has a doctorate in something called computational linguistics, has no qualms about supplying, as backdrop for his narrative, a new form of theocracy run by computer scientists, new technologies borrowed from mysterious extraterrestrials, and chapter-heading epigrams from such diverse sages as Marcus Aurelius, Northrop Frye, Benito Mussolini and Bob Dylan. He also supplies a cast of characters whose hang-ups make the legitimately confused Alexa Augustine look almost normal. Not least of the oddities are the AI's, computer-based artificial intelligences who, in more ways than one, are central to the story.

Somewhat to my surprise, I found the results exhilarating. In a world where information is power, who controls access to information? In a world dominated by computers, is freedom of thought an outmoded concept? Mr. Gawron writes about complex issues of human governance with commendable passion and flashes of poetry, and the intricately braided narrative, while sometimes difficult to follow, manages to straighten itself out just in time. □

Guillotine Dreams

A PLACE OF GREATER SAFETY
By Hilary Mantel. 749 pp. New York: Atheneum. $25.

By Olivier Bernier

THE French Revolution, that swirl of events, passions and tragedies, struck even its participants as highly improbable: no one could have guessed that Louis XVI, highly popular as late as the summer of 1790, would, two and a half years later, lose his life on the guillotine. Even when his execution had actually taken place, it still seemed almost more like fiction than fact.

For France, and then for the rest of Europe, the world changed utterly in the years that followed 1789: new regimes, new laws, a new organization of the way property was held, a new system of education — all these transformed the way people lived their lives. Great families, very lately at the peak of their splendor, struggled to survive; newcomers rose dramatically, from workman to marshal of France or, in the most celebrated case, from impoverished lieutenant to emperor.

Maximilien Robespierre.

All this made for reams of copy — first, and most austerely, in the shape of the decrees of the National Assembly and in the pages of official newspapers. Soon, though, the facts began to be presented in a more inviting way. By the 1820's the publication of memoirs had turned into a major industry, and almost everyone, from Lafayette to Napoleon himself, had his own version of events ready for all to read.

Most of these memoirs were, in fact, partly fictional. The next step was for the Revolution to provide novelists with a dramatic backdrop: Alexandre Dumas took care of that in a series of volumes, starting with "Joseph Balsamo"; but while real and famous people appear in his pages, it is only fleetingly and at a distance. The same was true, a little later, when Dickens wrote "A Tale of Two Cities."

It's understandable, then, that a late-20th-century novelist, Hilary Mantel, working at a much greater remove, should turn the tables and make the principal figures of the Revolution the main characters in her new novel, "A Place of Greater Safety." As for history itself, it has been assigned an ambiguous role: the main events are real; snatches of dialogue and letters come from authentic sources; as for the rest, Ms. Mantel writes airily in an author's note, "anything that seems particularly unlikely is probably true." That, together with her sneer at "the complaints of pedants," leaves her readers in a curiously uncertain position: are we reading history amplified by the empathy of the novelist or fiction dressed up in historical costume?

Ms. Mantel, who has published four previous novels in her native Britain, is a gifted writer, so this is a hard question to answer. As a work of fiction, "A Place of Greater Safety" is unquestionably a success. Ms. Mantel understands how people feel, how they react, how they think. She has the kind of long view that enables her convincingly to take up a character in childhood and bring him or her to dramatic adulthood. Just as important, she knows how to make us sympathize. To meet Danton as the unruliest of boys, then as a happily married young lawyer, helps us to comprehend his emotions as he progresses to the revolutionary leadership he eventually assumes. And it is not only Danton we meet; Ms. Mantel's cast of characters is wide and varied, from a conventional civil servant to Robespierre and his acid sister, Charlotte, from Choderlos de Laclos, the author of "Les Liaisons Dangereuses," to the naïve and enthusiastic Lucile, wife of Camille Desmoulins.

In presenting these characters to the reader, Ms. Mantel weaves in and out of the first-person singular: sometimes we are hearing their thoughts, and sometimes we are dispassionately watching them from the outside; sometimes they speak to us directly. Here, too, we are in good hands, since these shifts of perspective add an aura of reality to the interior monologues, of truth to the exterior descriptions. And, of course, Ms. Mantel makes ample use of the period's climactic events: we pass from the inebriating hopes of the early Revolution to the undiluted tragedy of the Terror, and everything we have learned about the characters helps us to understand how this has happened.

Still, there is much in Ms. Mantel's very long novel that also feels forced. It is not so easy, after all, for a 20th-century author to become an 18th-century revolutionary, and on occasion she writes dialogue that reads like a parody of a historical novel:

"Robespierre was ill. The raw spring weather hurt his chest, and his stomach rejected what he fed it.

" 'So you desert your friends,' he said, wheezing a little.

" 'This need not affect our friendship,' Camille said grandly.

"Robespierre looked away.

" 'You remind me — what's the name of that English King?'

" 'George,' Robespierre snapped.

" 'I think I mean Canute.' "

This, in the end, is the weakness of "A Place of Greater Safety," and because of it the tension between history and fiction is never resolved, not infrequently leaving the reader stranded. It is easy to see why the Revolution proved such a temptation for Ms. Mantel. To make its earthshaking developments come alive through their participants is a noble ambition, but in the end we are left to wonder whether more novel and less history might not better suit this author's unmistakable talent. □

UNDERTOW
By Lynn Stegner.
Baskerville Publishers,
7340 L.B.J. Freeway, Suite 125,
Dallas, Tex. 75251-1066, $21.

Anne McBain may be in trouble, but her creator gracefully avoids every gaping pitfall. A simple plot summary of Lynn Stegner's glowing first novel — a single woman reaches a crisis point in her relationship with a married man — might reduce "Undertow" to cliché, when in fact both the writing and the story have an elevating dignity and presence. Anne, a graduate student in marine biology, can no longer avoid her problems when she discovers that she is pregnant by a professor. What will she do? Why is she so attracted to married men? And most of all, what is the relationship between Anne's present predicament and her mother's willingness to play down years of nighttime "visits" paid to Anne by her father? Wisely, Ms. Stegner sets all this inner turmoil against the backdrop of the natural world, providing a graceful layering of prose that is only occasionally hindered by an obvious use of symbolism. "Undertow" is a fascinating depiction of a woman's attempts to "throw down the pick-up-sticks of her life" and learn how to play her own game. KAREN RAY

THE FOURSOME
Houghton Mifflin, $21.

In his sixth novel, John D. Spooner builds a fine foursome of male characters, each a worldly mix of strengths and flaws, ego and eccentricity, and each a success by society's material standards. Dickie, Freddy, Duke and Red finesse, flaunt and flounder their way from their teens in the 1950's to middle age in the 90's, winning and losing money, relationships, religion and friends. Golf is the vehicle, but "The Foursome" is really about camaraderie and competition. BILL SHARP

TURBULENCE
By Chico Buarque.
Pantheon, $19.

This first novel by the Brazilian singer and dramatist Chico Buarque is a nightmarish trip through the paranoid landscape of a sprawling unnamed city. The dazed but eloquent narrator, also nameless, is both a product and an observer of this urban chaos. A son of the elite, he slips between the European-identified leisure class, cordoned off in luxurious compounds, and the overcrowded slums. The city is mined with seductive and perilous booby traps, many of which the narrator sets off as he brushes up against thievery, rape and murder. There are no outlets for him, no passages to provide escape; the city's disease has infected even the countryside, where his family farm has become a decadent wasteland. Mr. Buarque's writing is both sharp and hypnotic; the dreamlike narration is kept in motion by its snowballing pace and powerful imagery, while the translation by Peter Bush keeps up admirably with Mr. Buarque's hip and edgy sensibility. And yet, although its loosely linked episodes give "Turbulence" cinematic immediacy, the novel's effect, like that of an evening display of fireworks, is vivid but short-lived.

VOICES OF SUMMER
By Diane Pearson.
Crown, $20.

Imagine a charming little town in the Austrian mountains where clever civic leaders have restored an exquisite opera house and successfully established an operetta season that brings in free-spending tourists. Imagine a retired Viennese impresario, one as suave and accomplished as Franz Busacher, who manages the performances and takes on the annual challenge of finding "one reasonably competent, reasonably young, reasonably attractive soprano" who can endure appearing opposite the preening star of the company, the famous, pretentious and lecherous tenor Karl Gesner. "Voices of Summer" is a treat, as airy yet firm as a meringue. The plot is cleverly woven of spun-sugar threads twisted and arranged to support such familiar confectionary elements as the professional resuscitation of a faded soprano and the personal humiliation of a caddish tenor. Diane Pearson's sixth novel is bittersweet and charming — an operetta of a novel.

15,000 Portraits of His Friends

Bill (Bojangles) Robinson in 1933.

There is nothing more fascinating to regard than the human face. Sixty-one extraordinary faces — most belonging to well-known writers, artists and performers — are on view in the elegant volume THE PASSIONATE OBSERVER: Photographs by Carl Van Vechten (Hallmark Cards/ University of New Mexico, cloth, $40; paper, $25). Carl Van Vechten (1880-1964) was a connoisseur of avant-garde art, dance and music, an early and knowledgeable enthusiast of black American culture, and a writer whose work included music criticism for The New York Times early in the century, seven novels, and eight volumes of music and literary criticism. Gregarious and a bit of a dandy (he was known for gold and jade bracelets and outrageous neckties), Van Vechten counted among his friends Gertrude Stein, George Gershwin, Paul Robeson, W. Somerset Maugham, Langston Hughes, Eugene O'Neill and Mabel Dodge. He was an inveterate collector and cataloguer; at the age of 15 he began taking photographs with a box camera. Of the more than 15,000 photographs he made over the last 30 years of his life, most are portraits, many of friends or acquaintances. "His artistic vision was founded on a belief in the primacy of the talented individual and a recognition of the varied backgrounds, temperaments and tastes from which such accomplishment could arise," Keith F. Davis, the fine-arts programs director at Hallmark Cards, writes in a graceful and informative essay. Van Vechten's photographs combine the informality and immediacy of the snapshot with a highly personal and studied documentation of his subjects. In portraits of subjects like Gershwin, Maugham, Bill (Bojangles) Robinson, Bessie Smith, Willa Cather, Anna May Wong, Marlon Brando and Thomas Mann, Van Vechten created strange, evocative images that reveal aspects not only of the subject but also of the photographer and of his era. FROM YALE TO JAIL
The Life Story of a Moral Dissenter.
By David Dellinger.
Pantheon, $27.50.

David Dellinger is best known as one of the defendants in the Chicago conspiracy trial, in which he and seven other members of the antiwar movement were prosecuted for their roles in organizing protests at the 1968 Democratic National Convention. In "From Yale to Jail," Mr. Dellinger, who is 77, reflects on his half-century of political activism, including the Chicago trial. He begins with stories from his youth in a wealthy Boston suburb and at Yale University, where the hypocrisy and inequality he witnessed among family, peers and teachers became the impetus for his radical politics. As a student at Union Theological Seminary, Mr. Dellinger was imprisoned for refusing to register for the draft during World War II; this was the first of many prison terms he served in political protest. In the 1950's he demonstrated against the Korean War and smuggled antiwar literature to Soviet soldiers. In the 60's he was instrumental in efforts to persuade Martin Luther King Jr. to come out against the war in Vietnam, and he negotiated with the North Vietnamese Government to gain the release of American prisoners of war. Considering the range of Mr. Dellinger's experience, the story of his life should be quite interesting. However, too often the events touched on are relayed without the attention to detail that would have brought them to life. Sorely missing as well is any reflective historical overview or insight. One comes away impressed by Mr. Dellinger but not by his book.

. . . THE GRAND PIANO CAME BY CAMEL
Arthur C. Mace,
the Neglected Egyptologist.
By Christopher C. Lee.
Mainstream/Trafalgar Square, $34.95.

Yes, there will always be an England, and people in it like Christopher C. Lee (actually, he moved to Scotland in 1972). The curator at Lochwinnoch Museum, Mr. Lee documents in the charming book ". . . The Grand Piano Came by Camel" the life and work of the early Egyptologist Arthur C. Mace. Family photographs, journals and letters take Mace, who helped develop the Metropolitan Museum of Art's department of Egyptian art, from his birth in 1874 to the upper middle strata of Victorian Britain to his death in 1928, a victim, it was said at the time, of the curse of Tutankhamen. Oh, the piano. It was a Bechstein, sent out to ameliorate the life of Mace's wife, Winifred, at an archeological dig in Egypt, circa 1907. "The episode indicates," Mr. Lee writes, "that even when living abroad, under difficult circumstances, the British were able to keep up standards and indeed a degree of style."

OBJECTS OF DESIRE
Conversations With Luis Buñuel.
By José de la Colina and Tomás Pérez Turrent.
Marsilio, $24.

From "Un Chien Andalou" in 1928 to "That Obscure Object of Desire" in 1977, Luis Buñuel's films explored the boundaries of the mundane that are the domain of Surrealism. "Dreams are a continuation of reality, of waking life," Buñuel says in "Objects of Desire," the transcription of a series of interviews the Spanish director conducted with two Mexican film critics, José de la Colina and Tomás Pérez Turrent, from 1975 to 1977. In discussing his 32 movies, Buñuel (1900-83) is charmingly temperamental in his refusal to be cornered by the exegeses of his interrogators. "I make a film and then set it free," he says at one point. "If you two see the film differently from how I made it, that's all right. I would even accept that your vision is better." Paul Lenti's sensitive translation from the Spanish preserves the aphoristic quality of Buñuel's speech ("Nowadays, scandal isn't what it used to be"), his occasional exasperation ("I am not preoccupied by my obsessions. Why does grass grow in the garden? Because it is fertilized to do so") and the passion of his credo: "For me, Surrealism was not an esthetic, just another avant-garde movement; it was something to which I committed myself in a spiritual and moral way."

Someone to Be Stopped in Chile

ALLENDE: A NOVEL
By Fernando Alegría.
Translated by Frank Janney.
Illustrated. 303 pp. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press. $24.95.

By Nicolas Shumway

IN 1971 President Salvador Allende Gossens of Chile asked a longtime friend, Fernando Alegría, a distinguished Chilean critic who is now an emeritus professor of the humanities at Stanford University, to write his biography. Allende granted Mr. Alegría several interviews, the last one only days before his death in a right-wing military coup in 1973. Despite this commission, Mr. Alegría has chosen to write what he calls a novel, arguing: "There are moods I must describe and interpret, words that I can hear which perhaps were not said, rumors, events that I did not witness and yet I feel I know how they happened. All this has become a hidden world that calls for a novelist, not just a reporter."

The desirability of such a hybrid is amply demonstrated in "The Perón Novel," Tomás Eloy Martínez's 1985 book, from which Perón, despite repeated attempts to manipulate and conceal his past, emerges with a full-bodied believability not present in even his best biographies. In comparison, Mr. Alegría's Allende never quite comes alive, despite much well-wrought prose, admirably translated by Frank Janney. Unlike Mr. Martínez, Mr. Alegría takes too few risks. As a result, "Allende: A Novel" often reads more like an exemplary tale than the story of a controversial, complex and undeniably fascinating man.

Born for politics in a family dominated by the memory of his grandfather, an anticlerical educator and Grand Mason, Allende grew up desiring radical change. With unstinting devotion, he fought for the material welfare of Chile's poor. Although middle-class himself, he distrusted Chile's elite just as much as he despised the foreign mining magnates who exploited workers and bought governments. Although a democracy of sorts, Chile's Government was dominated by the wealthy, whose internal disagreements gave the appearance of pluralism while excluding the lower classes from power. Allende thus considered "bourgeois democracy" a sham. Yet, unlike Fidel Castro, Ernesto (Che) Guevara, Camilo Torres and even members of his own family, Allende sought revolutionary change through existing democratic processes. Mr. Alegría suggests that two contradictory figures coexisted in Allende: the romantic revolutionary he aspired to become and his reformist grandfather, who believed that democratic principles followed to their logical conclusion would yield material as well as political equality.

Mr. Alegría skillfully reconstructs the discussions of Allende's youth, assembling a vast cast of characters that readers unfamiliar with Chile's history may find overwhelming. As a teen-ager in 1927, Allende saw Chile's Government taken over by a military figure, Carlos Ibáñez, an admirer of Mussolini, in what amounted to a coup. Later, as a radical student leader in medical school, Allende saw Ibáñez replaced by another military man, Marmaduque Grove, a leftist who gave Chile its "100-day Socialist Republic." Mr. Alegría suggests that Allende's experience with both leftist and rightist "coup-ism" convinced him that permanent change needed broad popular support. He thus saw himself as a teacher who would instruct the people rather than lead the troops. And indeed, Allende became an extraordinary orator whose clarity, eloquence and powers of persuasion would largely account for his political success.

Although Allende practiced medicine and served a successful stint as Chile's Minister of Health, he devoted himself primarily to politics. In 1945 he won his first of four elections to the Senate, where he became a highly visible critic of Chilean society. His avowed Marxism and his sympathy for the Soviet Union irritated moderate leftists just as surely as his devotion to traditional democratic procedure upset those to his left. Mr. Alegría pointedly notes that cold warriors in the United States, not given to such nuances, early marked Allende as someone to be stopped.

Allende ran for president four times. His campaigns aimed at two main targets: social injustice and foreign influence, or, as Mr. Alegría defines things, the enemy within and the enemy without. Postwar prosperity in Chile sharpened contrasts between rich and poor at the same time that American anti-Communist sentiment made the United States increasingly intrusive and punitive. Unintimidated, Allende supported Fidel Castro's revolution and visited Cuba and the Soviet Union more than once. His idealism attracted followers ranging from the poet Pablo Neruda, who received the Nobel Prize in Literature, to pop singers. In Allende's early tries for the presidency, he was defeated by candidates bankrolled by the C.I.A. He finally won in 1970, but only by pasting together a fractious coalition of rival leftists that barely mustered a plurality.

DESPITE such shaky support, President Allende showed no hesitation in promoting a revolutionary agenda, complete with nationalizations, land redistribution, mandatory wage increases, price controls and an official visit from Mr. Castro. Chile's conservatives reacted by fighting him all the harder. More significant in the short term, perhaps, was the determination of the White House, in the years when Richard Nixon was President and Henry Kissinger his national security adviser, to intensify a not-so-covert campaign against the Allende Government, a campaign later investigated and denounced by the United States Senate Intelligence Committee.

What Mr. Alegría adds to the story is a particularly poignant account of Allende's last days: his bitter disappointment at the failure of his nonviolent revolution, his farewell to his family and his refusal to accept the military's offer of safe transport out of Chile. Mr. Alegría suggests that despite Allende's commitment to peaceful revolution, he ultimately accepted, and maybe even sought, a violent death, perhaps sensing that he could serve his ideals better as a martyr than as a deposed president in exile.

While "Allende: A Novel" does well to recall such a significant life, its Allende remains a distant figure whose motivations and thoughts are poorly rendered. Mr. Alegría treats his subject with too much reverence, a reverence best suited for portraying lives of saints. That may have been Mr. Alegría's intention. Now that triumphant capitalism is sweeping Latin America, and Mr. Castro has metamorphosed from revolutionary to anachronism, I sense that Mr. Alegría wants to rekindle the enthusiasms of his generation by eulogizing one of its most outstanding leaders.

But such intentions, however laudatory, do not make for either a good novel or a good biography. In the meantime, we should not forget that the appalling social injustice Allende spent his life condemning has not disappeared. Nor should we proclaim the inevitable success of neoliberalism while forgetting the noble aspirations that led several generations of Latin America's best people to embrace leftist causes. If this book jogs our memories and consciences a bit, it will have served a good cause. □

FOR THE LIFE OF LAETITIA

By Merle Hodge.
214 pp. New York:
Farrar, Straus & Giroux. $15.
(Ages 12 and up)

By Elizabeth Cohen

In her social studies class the first week of secondary school, 12-year-old Laetitia, a black girl in Trinidad known to her friends as Lacey, learns about Happy Families and their opposite, Broken Homes. Happy Families, illustrated by a picture hung up by her teacher, consist of well-coiffed white people — a blond mother and a square-jawed father, a ruddy-cheeked boy and girl.

When the heroine of Merle Hodge's fine novel, "For the Life of Laetitia," draws her family — a sprawling clan of bush cocoa farmers in the distant village of Sooklal Trace: "Ma, Pappy, Uncle Leroy, Mammy Patsy, Uncle Jamesie, Tantie Monica, me, my sister, my brother, Carlyle, and all my first cousins" — the teacher is not amused. "Where are the husband and wife?" she asks. "And they have all those children!" Lacey's mother works in a hospital in faraway New York; her grandmother Mistress Wilhemina Johnson (Ma) is "responsible" for her.

After she passes the entrance examination to attend the high school in the town of La Puerta, her father, whom Lacey has rarely seen before, careers into her life in his big car, to take her to live there with him and his new family. "He had opened a bottle of whisky for the fellows on the job. He had shown the Big Boss my name in the paper, and told him that I was his daughter, and the Big Boss had congratulated him."

Lacey's new life is streaked with disappointment. Far from the cool, green rural world where she planted "pigeon peas on Corpus Christi" in her own little garden plot, washed her uncle's bicycle and helped her grandmother bake sugar cakes and tamarind balls to sell to people riding the bus that stopped by their village, Lacey becomes lonely and dispirited. Not only does her teacher criticize her family ("Now, think about it, can that family be happy? No, I don't think so. That looks like the family of the Old Woman Who Lived in a Shoe!"), but her new friend, an Indian girl named Anjanee, who comes in from the country, misses school and always looks tired.

Furthermore, Lacey's father forbids her to return home to Sooklal Trace on weekends. Her grandmother told her about him in a stinging warning: "Tell me if that man raise his hand for you. . . . That man like to hit." But she never expected to find her stepmother a trembling woman who rarely ventures out of the house and spends all her days cleaning and cooking or to find her stepbrother, Michael, a spoiled little boy who never bathes or makes his own bed and who cannot read. Out late each night and often drunk, Lacey's father yells at her and insists on looking over all her schoolwork, although he can hardly read himself.

When Anjanee's condition worsens, she admits to Lacey that her father and brothers will not give her carfare for school and that she is forced to clean all their clothes and cook for them before they allow her to leave. As Lacey watches, horrified, her friend's schoolwork deteriorates, along with her health. Lacey is miserable at her father's home on weekends. She is further alienated by institutionalized racial tension among Indian, black and mixed-race schoolmates. Initially at the top of her class, Lacey soon begins cutting classes, finally joining a gang going to a forbidden mall for lunch. Caught with the group, she is briefly suspended from school.

Near the end of Ms. Hodge's taut, lyrical novel, Lacey hears from classmates that Anjanee has committed suicide by drinking poison. Lacey returns to her father's house, where she breaks down completely. The plot elements ring true but bring up serious questions about the very boundaries of children's literature. In many ways this book is as much an adult novel as Jamaica Kincaid's "Annie John," but the decision has been made to print it in larger type and suggest it for ages 12 and up, as a young-adult book, inevitably limiting the audience.

"For the Life of Laetitia," which uses the lilting English of Trinidad, where Ms. Hodge lives and teaches, in the dialogue, is at once a magical coming-of-age story and a nightmarish tale of a young girl's psychological disintegration. Perhaps what makes it appropriate for younger readers is the resolution. Over the summer, Ma and the extended family in Sooklal Trace arrange for Lacey to return to school as a commuter. So, although it will be difficult, she faces the next school year with optimism. □

When Thousands Vanished

DOSSIER SECRETO

Argentina's Desaparecidos and the Myth of the "Dirty War."
By Martin Edwin Andersen.
Illustrated. 412 pp. Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press.
Cloth, $59. Paper, $17.95.

By Linda Robinson

When Raúl Alfonsín was elected president of Argentina in 1983, marking the return of democracy after years of military dictatorship, he created a commission headed by the Argentine writer Ernesto Sábato and charged it with producing a comprehensive record of the atrocities committed by the military during the years from 1975 to 1979, the most intense period of the infamous "dirty war." Titled "Nunca Más" ("Never Again"), the commission report compiled horrifying evidence of some 9,000 "disappeared" persons. Most experts agree that thousands more were victims of arbitrary arrest, detention and torture.

Martin Edwin Andersen's "Dossier Secreto" is a sort of "Nunca Más" with a thesis. Like the Argentine report, this book by a former Argentine-based reporter for Newsweek and The Washington Post chronicles one of the grimmest chapters in Latin America's history, a tragedy that went on for years while the world averted its gaze. Mr. Andersen, now a consultant to the Justice Department on international justice issues, argues not only that the repressive methods used by the armed forces were unconscionable by any standard of conduct, but also that there was never a threat requiring anything remotely resembling a war, dirty or otherwise. Yet the Argentine military claimed to be fighting the first battles of World War III. As early as 1962, Mr. Andersen shows, the military gave advance notice that it was girding for combat. In a report to foreign military representatives that was dressed up in cold war rhetoric, it declared: "Counter-revolutionary warfare is mainly intended to prevent mass contamination of the people and to prevent the seizure of basic organizations of the country by Marxist ideologists and their agents. The purpose of this counterrevolutionary warfare is to preserve the national ideological sovereignty. . . . Sometimes the combination of certain factors may call for the timely intervention of a surgeon to eradicate the evil before the body becomes too weak and is totally diseased."

Mr. Andersen's thesis is that the military, in order to justify a sweeping purge of all elements of Argentine society that it deemed suspect, infiltrated one of the guerrilla groups, the Montoneros, and manipulated it, even bombing and murdering in its name, exaggerating what was in fact a tiny subversive movement. Though the guerrillas by mid-1976 had been devastated, the military made them appear a continuing threat so that it could prolong its repression. Mr. Andersen's dogged reporting has unearthed dozens of examples of the lengths to which the guardians of order were willing to go to perpetuate their hoax, such as calling for a strike under the Montoneros' name and then brutally squelching it.

The book's treatment of the dirty war is a tour de force, indicting a military run amok. It had convinced itself that students, teachers, clergymen, unionists and intellectuals were the country's mortal enemies. Mr. Andersen also calls into question the United States Government's role in Argentina during this time.

The most shocking charge in "Dossier Secreto" is that the military's infiltration extended to the top Montonero leader, Mario Firmenich, who, the author says, was a double agent actively aiding the military's Machiavellian plan, even sending his own comrades into ambushes and to certain capture and death. Mr. Andersen first made this claim in a March 1989 article in The Nation. Here, he adds supporting evidence of Mr. Firmenich's duplicity.

But it is troubling that the identification of Mr. Firmenich as a double agent comes from a single source, a retired Central Intelligence Agency station chief posted to Buenos Aires and identified only as "Sam." At one point, Mr. Andersen tells us in a footnote that he has provided two letters by Sam to the book's publisher confirming Mr. Firmenich's role. This does not help the reader to weigh the truth of the allegation. Of course, one difficulty in an instance such as this arises from the restrictions the C.I.A. places on its former employees. But in the same footnote an Argentine source gives only weak confirmation of Sam's claim, saying: "It's possible . . . it might have. . . . I can't say, but I'm convinced of one thing — they did each other favors."

Mr. Andersen's research produces a strong presumption of duplicity on Mr. Firmenich's part. Unfortunately, Mr. Firmenich refused to be interviewed for this book. The author does point out that Mr. Firmenich was a nationalist and a Peronist, and many of his targets were members of the Marxist People's Revolutionary Army. So it is indeed plausible that he could have been a willing accomplice of the Argentine armed forces in their war against the left.

About half of "Dossier Secreto" chronicles the decades before the 1970's, when the armed forces practiced and refined the techniques that they would use to wage their dirty war. This long prologue somewhat dilutes the central drama of Mr. Firmenich and the Montoneros' manipulation.

More important, missing from this account of the growing chaos is a clear acknowledgment that the society itself was breaking down. This was not simply a case of cowed but decent folk falling into the hands of neofascists and neo-Nazis; a wide array of groups, right and left, had embraced violence. Mr. Andersen recounts but does not explore one of the most violent incidents, Juan Perón's 1973 homecoming at Ezeiza airport after 17 years of exile, when Peronist thugs of the right set upon poorly armed Peronists of the left. Such anarchy is crucial to explain, though obviously it does not excuse, how the military came to step in so that it could impose order at any cost. Even though violence of the right and the systematic bloodbath of the military went on for years, taking a far higher toll than the blood spilled by the left, the societal breakdown was evident before the generals stepped in.

Curiously, Mr. Andersen lays very little responsibility for that breakdown at Perón's doorstep. Perón remains opaque in this book — Mr. Andersen seems content simply to brand him an opportunist — yet he clearly fostered the anarchy and the eventual military crackdown by encouraging guerrilla activity and radicalism while courting the right. By playing one side off against the other, he ultimately left the door open to the dirty war.

"Dossier Secreto" is not a work to be shelved with historical military studies. It documents the depths to which apparently civilized societies can sink. It calls into question the wisdom of the 1990 presidential pardons of the dirty war's perpetrators and of Mario Firmenich. And as messianic military men resurrect their appeal in Venezuela and elsewhere, it forces us to confront the crucial questions of why such madness occurs and whether it might occur again. □

Evidence From the Deep

One of the first recorded cases of cadavers "disappearing" mafia-style into the deep came shortly after the coup. A body . . . surfaced on the Uruguayan side of the muddy, red-brown waters of the Río de la Plata. Uruguayan officials said that its features suggested it might be that of a Korean or Japanese, perhaps a sailor washed overboard. . . . The hypothesis did not hold up. The river continued to deposit its macabre cargo along Uruguay's Atlantic coast. Some bodies bore deep cuts, others were missing limbs, most lacked fingernails and toenails. The situation soon reached the intolerable. In the posh beach resort of Punta del Este — favored by upper-class Argentines — people began to complain that the "floaters" were ruining their vacations.

From "Dossier Secreto."

A Doctor Talks with Women About Their Health and Bodies
by Harold Schulman MD

Wouldn't you like to get more information from your doctor? The media gives so much news, but is it reliable, and isn't it from reporters, not doctors?

An internationally known physician has created a newsletter for women who want more and better information. It's like talking to your doctor each month. Some excerpts from the first issue:

Estrogen and the Menopause: "It is easy to accept that a woman's childbearing years should be limited, but estrogen seems to provide youth and vitality" "Replacing estrogen seems logical, but are we doing harm?"

The AFP Test. The search for the imperfect baby. "Future research will have to do better. Six percent of pregnant women screen positive but we only find 60% of Down's babies." Lot's of anxiety; is the test worth doing?

Mother, there's a problem with my Pap smear! "How can young women have suspicious tests for cancer?" "Does a virus cause cancer of the cervix?" How to avoid over treatment!.

Book Review. The Silent Passage by Gail Sheehy. Physicians don't listen to their clients. This book may help doctors and women.

nothing in those places," he concedes, "partly because there would be little time to discover anything genuine, and partly because I never found anything of interest deliberately; the best discoveries of my life have been by accident." Fortunately, he changed his mind upon being advanced "a ridiculously small amount of money that was, however, more than my poetry had earned me in a lifetime of practicing its dangerous pinturns."

Mr. Codrescu takes off with a television documentary crew and a photographer, David Graham, who complements the author well in glimpsing the random nonsense and unreliable reality of things in general. It is a measure of Mr. Codrescu's talent that such an orchestrated mission manages to produce an unpretentious, wry journey in the art of essay writing, from light to sparsely serious. Once at the wheel of America's "banal instrument of carnage," the writer buys fuzzy dice and a drink holder and begins driving from his New Orleans home to the Lower East Side digs of Allen Ginsberg. There they lightly agree to plot for the reburial of the poet Ted Berrigan's remains in the St. Mark's Church grave of Peter Stuyvesant, documented in passing from Mr. Codrescu's interesting store of American antihistory as a founding anti-Semite.

THUS does he putter in a kind of countertravelogue about the land, all the way to San Francisco, via the "Kingdom of If," Las Vegas, with rarely a dull page in this simple book. It is mainly about the fun of writing and reading and meandering, rather than self-conscious synthesizing. Better for the reader to have Mr. Codrescu philosophically accepting a fax about the next city's lodgings from a cemetery attendant in Camden, N.J., who intrudes as the writer tries to have a special thought at the grave of Whitman, "sexually manifold and optimistic, the spokesman of liberty in all its guises."

Non sequitur, no harm. We're soon visiting the Burned-Over Patch region of surviving zealotries in a narrow swath of rural western New York. First, the Hutterians, the Christian communist and pacifist refugees who fled Hitler to live in Amish-like aloofness in a Bruderhof, or "place of brotherhood." Then the descendants of the Oneida Perfectionists, who lived in a community conceived in free love, where the poet pines for the lost spirit of "continual flirtation as in a medieval court of love." Mr. Codrescu is the sort of writer who feels obliged to satirize and interplay with reality and not just catalogue impressions. He can redeem flagging curiosity in a single sentence, as when, returning to Detroit, haunts he loved as a student, he finds he must wax more Mad Maxish than Whitmanesque: "I see that when a city becomes extinct, its last inhabitants go crazy."

Mr. Codrescu is a reminder that locomotion is not the heart of the matter; a decent imagination in. Opinionated travelogue inventories of Americana won't do. Nor will serial compilations of unforgettable characters suffice, as Pete Davies proves in "Storm Country: A Journey Through the Heart of America." Mr. Davies, a British novelist, is tireless as a lepidopterist in netting what feels like each and every flitting Midwesterner he spies in his travels (13 states, 1981 Ford pickup) in the heartland "with its savage weather and its sentimental music." He packs his pages with characters, and the friends and relatives of these characters, each of them with a story to tell and each story pretty much told in his book to the point of Chaucerian overdrive. "It's the nearest thing I know to going to the moon — and I love it!" he exults as he wheels about, trying to document the withering of "the whole mythic notion of what America is" and capturing individual lives "fresh out of a country song." It is the latter quality that intoxicates the book all too well. He concludes his 7,449 miles by comparing America to "that girl you had that thing with when you were 20," an experience "bigger than good or bad, bolder than right or wrong." Well, I guess.

No less enthusiastic at motoring but far more shy in bagging talkative people is Jonathan Yardley, at the wheel of a Ford Taurus SHO as he travels and presents his thoughts in "States of Mind: A Personal Journey Through the Mid-Atlantic." To the uninitiated, the geographical premise may seem more a thesis to be defended than a destination that can set conventioneers and connoisseurs to reminiscing. Therein lies the region's modest, moderate, mid-placed, middling virtues, as Mr. Yardley, a book critic and columnist for The Washington Post, explains in a book that grew out of an article in Mid-Atlantic Country, a magazine dedicated to promoting the region. He defends his turf with amiable but obvious labor, the essay mileage mounting from oceanfront restaurants to mountain hamlets. It reads best as a kind of traveler's memoir of his various family roots, from Philadelphia to Carolina.

The nation is changing weirdly, wonderfully, as new immigrants, fresh life-and-death travelers, instantly redefine the lay of the land.

Like any contrived trip, the book can grow tedious with its passing lists of roadside signs and stores, the literary sprinklings of ironies about the passing American blur that punctuate the trip as regularly as toll booths, its minor annoyance or pleasure with travel accommodations, and ultimately even in its undeniably personal joy in tales of Chapel Hill and the Baltimore Orioles. The discovery of place, of someone, proves elusive. By the time we pull up at the sentence "It was time to have a look at New Jersey," readers can wonder more about the publishing industry's bearings than about what might be echt-perfect in Mid-Atlantica.

JIM LILLIEFORS is a more gifted reporter who gets out of the car and engages people, a practiced feature-story journalist who tries for something more in "Highway 50: Ain't That America." His book is better enjoyed as a loose collection of good stories told by a professional witness and story lover than as a singular journey in an old Ford LTD on a transcontinental pioneer road haunted these days by truckers and nostalgia. Mr. Lilliefors's talent is rooted in an interesting tension as he attempts to see and nudge beyond reportage to more creative intimations about the people and phenomena of his trip. But his technique can sometimes produce such excesses in character limning and crisp dialogue-building that all the literary labor jeopardizes his wanderlust and our hunger to be surprised.

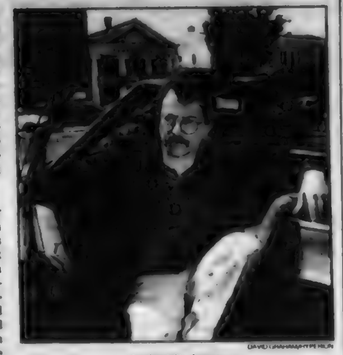
But the basic honesty of the stories feels undeniable, a considerable virtue in this sort of book-reading, and some of the pieces are passing gems of journalism, as when he gently pauses in Hutchinson, Kan., to do some Mark Twain-like reporting on why the town's "largest grain elevator in the world" really isn't. He lets people expound unchallenged on why Midwesterners are more respectful and probably smarter than New Jerseyites and on other passing defensible biases. He lingers quietly with Amish farmers in Yoder, Kan., and is rewarded with a farewell hope that "you find someplace where you're happy."

Keeping it simple and narrative — "Outside of town, a tractor is cutting a slug trail in the dirt where alfalfa is left to dry. Things are growing again" — Mr. Lilliefors navigates the very toughest part of the trip, to journey beyond a book-writing notion and put places in our imagination and a taste of bourbon on our tongues as he finishes in a lakeside bar in Tahoe, "trying to come to some epiphany."

"I don't," he says, and "Cheers," say I.

Of all the premises for tooling about America, none is as high-octane as Eddy L. Harris's decision to buy an imposing blue BMW motorcycle, zipper up and angrily set out for the Deep South as a black American with a literary attitude. He growls forth challengingly into a region that "still owns my nightmares and haunts my memory." In the resulting book, "South of Haunted Dreams: A Ride Through Slavery's Old Back Yard," Mr. Harris thunders and backfires polemically, frequently fantasizing mayhem or death at the hands of potbellied white men somewhere down the road, but more often finding another diner waitress tugging a pencil out of her hair and calling him Sugar. "I am proud of who and what I am, as arrogant as my father ever was," this descendant of slaves and Jim-Crow sufferers announces in a book unfortunately heavier on tableaux of interior fulmination than exterior description. "I am afraid, am almost certain in fact, that before this trip ends someone will have died."

His mission, a kind of "Shaft Does Dixie," feels a bit too egocentric and time-warped even before ignition, but it could have proved airy and eye-opening. A kind of Candide in silvery negative would have been welcome, a gleaning in the fields of racism three decades after Martin Luther King Jr. Instead it's a variation on Narcissus as biker — "I look like a road warrior hellbent on finding trouble" — regularly going off on windy tangents, recapitulating the historic evils of racism and his own modern smartings at its symptoms farther north. The book never offers a convincing explanation of how the writer, just as the reader long suspects, will come to rest ultimately as a black an whose soul has been considerably eased by these travels, one who must finally concede finding, amid the tour's anecdotal racism, extensive change, charm and subtlety on the back roads of the South.



Andrei Codrescu.

For all sorts of reasons, a reader wishes dearly for a convincing moment of the writer's being struck like St. Paul from his bully saddle and having to describe, not merely announce, how his original road map worked out more pleasantly than he had so feverishly anticipated. Occasional blocks of perfect Socratic dialogue with Southern blacks in place do not do the trick in explaining the conversion of such an anger-driven traveler in a region so open to fresh imagination.

Like a traveling child, a reader needs road games in these wordy jaunts. Mr. Codrescu, one eye on the mirror to check on our attention span, takes care to detour to places like Sun City, Ariz., a retirement community of gray-haired bikers, so we can hear its punk rock band, One Foot in the Grave, play "Menopause." It beats counting brindled cows from the back seat. His imagination even saves us, just barely, at the book's more extended side trips into the post-Hippie spiritual pranks and placebos of the New Age counterculture in Santa Fe, N.M. Mr. Codrescu cannot resist nostalgically sampling the latest distractions from life at the hands of a crystal healer who transports him to "a profoundly tacky psychic gap." "You better hurry," he advises voyeuristic America. "Prices are going up as we speak."

Mr. Codrescu does well by vicariousness. His trip, antic as it is, silly as it can get, is best as a selfish sample of a nation changing weirdly, wonderfully, in one of its liveliest, most valuable eras of new immigrants — those fresh life-and-death travelers who are instantly redefining the lay of the land. "America is the place where you must deliberately forgo revenge if you are to go forward," is as close as Mr. Codrescu comes to prescribing from the wheel of the red Caddy. "You can be born again here, but like a baby you must cancel the pain that brought you here." □

Irene and Carl Horowitz

Fifty years after the ethnic persecution of the Jews in Europe there are still people who don't believe that it happened.

By writing this book Irene and Carl Horowitz prove that the Holocaust, the most inhuman treatment of people, really existed. Irene and Carl Horowitz were 16 years old when the war began. They are live witnesses to the atrocities committed by the Germans.

Carl was in a concentration camp. Irene survived by hiding in different places. Their book is a testimony to what happened in their communities.

The book is a gripping story of their miraculous survival. It describes the horrors of pogroms, hiding places and the concentration camps.

New & Noteworthy

WAITING TO EXHALE, by Terry McMillan. (Pocket Star, $5.99.) This novel follows the fortunes of four black women in Phoenix as they struggle with careers, motherhood and men. Reading it is "like being in the company of a great friend," Susan Isaacs said here last year. "It is thought-provoking, thoroughly entertaining and very, very comforting."

TRUMAN, by David McCullough. (Touchstone/Simon & Schuster, $15.) This biography illuminates the singular character of the small Midwestern man and former haberdasher who became President almost in spite of himself. What distinguished Truman, David McCullough argues, was his forthrightness and rare obliviousness to concerns about his or his party's image. Last year our reviewer, Alan Brinkley, found the book "warm, affectionate and thoroughly captivating" as well as "the most thorough account of Truman's life yet to appear."

Harry S. Truman.

Also out in a new paperback edition is HARRY S. TRUMAN (Avon, $12.50), the biography of the President written by his daughter, Margaret Truman. "Every anecdote adds human dimension to the Trumans as a family and to Harry as a man," Wilson C. McWilliams said in the Book Review in 1972.

CRASH DIET: Stories, by Jill McCorkle. (Fawcett Crest, $4.99.) Many of the characters in this collection are women in transition. Their milieu is the working-class South, of which our reviewer, Jack Butler, said last year that "Jill McCorkle renders it brilliantly, again and again delivering the shock of recognition."

CAPITOL GAMES: The Inside Story of Clarence Thomas, Anita Hill, and a Supreme Court Nomination, by Timothy M. Phelps and Helen Winternitz. (Harper Perennial, $14.) This book, with a new epilogue by the authors, presents the confirmation of Clarence Thomas for the Supreme Court as a victory of political maneuvering by the Bush Administration. It is a "comprehensive, beautifully written and insightful overview," Ronald Dworkin said in the Book Review last year.

CAROLINE'S DAUGHTERS, by Alice Adams. (Fawcett Gold Medal, $5.99.) Five daughters inhabit this novel, all very different and yet linked to one another and their mother, the strong and serene Caroline Carter. In 1991 our reviewer, Maeve Binchy, said, "The story is well told and moves very surely and deftly."

BARCELONA, by Robert Hughes. (Vintage, $14.) The art critic Robert Hughes has written a lengthy paean to the city, tracing its evolution from its ancient origins to its contemporary Catalan identity. "This book is destined to become, like Forster's 'Alexandria' and Mary McCarthy's 'Venice Observed,' a classic in the genre of urban history," Nicholas Shrady said here last year.

LOVE JUNKIE, by Robert Plunket. (Harper Perennial, $10.) Mimi Smithers, a Westchester matron, becomes a smitten follower and self-styled den mother of gay men in pre-AIDS New York. Last year our reviewer, Jay McInerney, said the author "craftily exploits the comic potential of a first-person narrator who doesn't comprehend the implications of her own observations."

THE DISPOSSESSED: America's Underclasses From the Civil War to the Present, by Jacqueline Jones. (Basic Books, $15.) Jacqueline Jones's thesis is that poverty is not the result of moral failing, but of a dearth of jobs and an abuse of power. "She has brought together an immense amount of information and analysis and produced a significant, dramatic and very readable volume," one critic said last year. Also new in paperback is THE VISIBLE POOR: Homelessness in the United States, by Joel Blau (Oxford University, $10.95). Last year one critic described Mr. Blau's work, which attributes homelessness to recent social and economic changes rather than mental illness or drug addiction, as a "thorough, astute overview."

LOVE AND GARBAGE, by Ivan Klima. Translated by Ewald Osers. (Vintage International, $11.) A Czech author, blocked by the state and his own exhaustion, takes a job as a street sweeper while he reviews his life and loves. In 1991 our reviewer, Eva Hoffman, said this novel "affords the experience, rare in today's fiction, of being in the presence of a seasoned, measured perspective, and a mind that strives honestly to arrive at a wisdom sufficient to our common condition."

LAST ONE OVER THE WALL: The Massachusetts Experiment in Closing Reform Schools, by Jerome G. Miller. (Ohio State University, $19.95.) During his brief tenure as head of the youth corrections system in Massachusetts, Jerome G. Miller closed the state's brutal reform schools in favor of more humane, community-based programs for juvenile offenders. His "remains a lonely crusade," David C. Anderson said here in 1991, "but the powerful lessons of Massachusetts make clear that it is hardly a waste of time."

THE KINDNESS OF WOMEN, by J. G. Ballard. (Harvest/Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, $10.95.) In this sequel to "Empire of the Sun," Jim, the protagonist, embarks on a nihilistic pursuit of sex after his wife's accidental death. In 1991 our reviewer, David R. Slavitt, described this autobiographical novel as a "profoundly sad and painful book, rueful the way Primo Levi's work was."

A STAINED WHITE RADIANCE, by James Lee Burke. (Avon, $5.50.) The Cajun police detective Dave Robicheaux has to confront demons from his past when he's drawn into an investigation of an old bayou family. The result is a "powerful, fatalistic" novel, Marilyn Stasio said here last year.

The Inquisition in Mississippi

TUMULT AND SILENCE AT SECOND CREEK
An Inquiry Into a Civil War Slave Conspiracy.
By Winthrop D. Jordan.
Illustrated. 391 pp. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. $24.95.

By Drew Gilpin Faust

THIS book, Winthrop D. Jordan tells us in his opening sentence, "is a story, but at the same time it is not." With this paradox, Mr. Jordan characterizes the outcome of more than 20 years of investigation into events that occurred nearly a century and a half ago. "Tumult and Silence at Second Creek: An Inquiry Into a Civil War Slave Conspiracy" is at once an effort to capture the experience of black and white Mississippians confronting the implications of the Civil War for Southern slavery and also — and perhaps even more fundamentally — an exploration into the nature of historical inquiry and interpretation.

Mr. Jordan, a professor of history and Afro-American studies at the University of Mississippi, has written a work of historical scholarship that leaves its scaffolding standing and visible, a study in which the process of discovery is at least as important as the result. He not only invites the engaged reader to participate in the struggle to understand the past, but he also includes almost all the available evidence in appendixes.

At the center of both of Mr. Jordan's linked objectives lies a single document, a record, in the handwriting of a white planter named Lemuel Parker Conner, of slave testimony before an extralegal examination committee in Adams County, Mississippi, in September 1861. Happening upon the manuscript in a Louisiana archive in 1971, Mr. Jordan set out to make sense of the tumult it described.

In the spring of 1861, he discovered, slaves in Adams County, "on a group of plantations near Second Creek," began, amid the disruptions of a society at war, to contemplate a plan for seizing their freedom. When fearful whites overheard expressions of rebelliousness, they undertook a formal interrogation of implicated slaves in order to stamp out any sparks of insurrection. As a result of their efforts, more than 27 slaves in and around Natchez, Miss., were hanged.

Yet little has been known about this tragedy, and the fragments of information inscribed in the historical record have for the most part been wrong. The "tumult" of the book's title has been surrounded by a "silence" that originally grew out of the desire of 19th-century Mississippians to prevent white panic over potential insurrections.

Yet the persistence of this silence into our own time, Mr. Jordan believes, has hidden from history an event of considerable significance, a slave conspiracy comparable to episodes, like Nat Turner's 1831 uprising, that have come to play a critical part in our understanding of the African-American past.

To make sense of Conner's document, Mr. Jordan draws upon his deep knowledge of American slavery and race relations. In 1968, he published "White Over Black: American Attitudes Toward the Negro, 1550-1812," a work that swept across centuries and continents — European, African, American — in an effort to identify the sources and origins of white racism. It was one of the most influential and acclaimed studies in the outpouring of work by scholars in the late 1960's and early 1970's that transformed our understanding of slavery. But like many other historians of slavery in recent years, Mr. Jordan has shifted, in his new book, from the inclusive breadth of "White Over Black" to the specificities of time and place permitted in a case study. And similarly reflecting more general scholarly trends, his concerns now encompass black attitudes and perspectives as well as white. Indeed, the special value of Conner's transcription, Mr. Jordan maintains, is that it "furnishes more information about the thoughts and aims of a group of rebel slaves than any other single document in American history."

Mr. Jordan's careful re-creation of the Natchez district of Mississippi in 1861 draws on every source he has been able to find in 20 years of searching and presents not just the economy of the cotton plantation South and the social fabric of perhaps the wealthiest slave-owning elite in North America, but the sights, sounds and smells of that time and place. He traces intricate relationships among slaves accused of participation in "the Plan," explores the reputations, family background and political loyalties of their owners, and discerns motivational ideologies in the fragments of slave statements recorded in Conner's hand. In the tense nature of some of the recorded testimony, Mr. Jordan hears "the slash of the whip" and concludes that "the term examine takes on the stench of euphemism for physical brutality." In the slave states, as Mr. Jordan notes, "whipping as a means of obtaining confessions" was not uncommon.

Yet for all the ingenuity of Mr. Jordan's research, for all the imagination and insight he brings to bear on his scanty sources, for all the richness of context in which he is able to place these events, he cannot, as he concedes at the outset, really tell the story of a slave conspiracy at Second Creek. He hopes instead, he says, to offer a "tapestry" or "something of a story."

ALEC SIEMS

But despite this open confession of the historian's inability to weave a sequential tale of cause and effect, Mr. Jordan, in some sense, wants to have it both ways, for he never really questions the basic reality of the plot itself. In order to establish the existence of an organized conspiracy, he reasserts the historian's authority he has ostensibly abandoned. Yet, empowered by Mr. Jordan's own offering of his documentary evidence and by his notion of a necessary arbitrariness and a certain relativism in historical interpretation, this reader finds it likely that the tumult at Second Creek was as much the creation of white fears as of actual slave conspiracy. Mr. Jordan does not satisfactorily establish that an organized plot, of the sort contrived by Nat Turner, ever really existed.

There were a few local observers who took such a view of the matter, judging that the slaves' discussions were largely a form of fantasizing about what they might do when the Yankees were victorious and Armageddon brought freedom at last. Mr. Jordan argues that Conner's document represented a verbatim transcription of slave testimony, but it is difficult to imagine that any frightened white Southerner in 1861 would not record at least some of what he expected to hear rather than what was actually said.

And it is impossible not to believe that white men with whips and guns would extract from terrorized slaves what the victims of the lash knew their oppressors wanted them to say. The slaves' testimony about their intentions toward the planters' women is crucial here. Conner's transcription contains several references by those being interrogated to their intention to "ravish" the planters' wives and daughters. "The persistent naming of individual women," Mr. Jordan notes, "is unique among the documents of slave rebellion in the United States."

As Mr. Jordan recognized in "White Over Black" a quarter-century ago, white fear of black sexuality was a fundamental aspect of the psychological and ideological context of North American slavery. But it was founded more in the projection of white anxieties than in any record of black aggressiveness, even during the upheaval of the Civil War.

What then is the meaning of the references in Conner's document? And what does their presence suggest about the significance of the document as a whole? Would slaves have used the term "ravish"? Does the frequent appearance of the word cast some doubt on the manuscript as a verbatim transcript? Does the attention to sexual violence throughout the testimony perhaps suggest that slaves, expecting death no matter what they said, decided at least to reap the pleasure of feeding their masters' worst fears? Was the plot more fantasy than conspiracy?

MR. JORDAN is not convincing when he dismisses the absence of a specific time and date for action by suggesting that African-Americans did not share white obsessions with temporal exactitude. The failure of the rebels to attend to such details supports a contemporary critic of the proceedings who believed that the slaves' conversations addressed the still uncertain Day of Jubilo.

Historians in the 1960's and 1970's quarreled about the existence or nonexistence of rebellions and conspiracies in order to buttress arguments about the essential docility of slaves or about their willing acceptance of their lack of freedom. There can remain little question in 1993 about the commitment of African-Americans in the Civil War South to their own liberation. More than 100,000 ex-slaves risked their lives as soldiers fighting for that freedom, and countless others emancipated themselves by running to Union lines.

The importance of deciding whether the tumult at Second Creek was a black plan or a white panic is not its relevance to these now outdated questions. It is instead to assess the significance of Conner's document and the accuracy of Mr. Jordan's assertion of its value. Does Conner provide a transparent window into the world of the slaves, or is the document a product and an index of white fears and white racism? Has Mr. Jordan gone beyond "White Over Black," beyond the world of the masters into the world of the slaves? Or has he struggled so desperately to overcome the silences surrounding the slave experience that he has misread white constructions of black men for the men themselves?

In keeping with his promises at the outset, Mr. Jordan's book ends not as a story might, with a resolution. It ends with a curious silence — a description of a pall that hangs over the land today and the banal declaration that the conspirators at Second Creek "lived in particular circumstances and . . . dealt with particular difficulties. In this they shared with other human beings the universal trial of living and dying each and all in their own way." Having been given the sights and smells, even the documents themselves, we as readers are finally left to decide what it all amounted to — for the participants and their survivors, for the South, for the course of the Civil War, for America. □

The New 'Doctor' In Town

DR. J once soared above the rim for the Nets and Dr. K is still flashing his fastball for the Mets, but now New York has another physician specializing in perspiration: Doc Rivers of the Knicks.

Call him Dr. Trey.

When the Knicks are introduced before today's opener of their Eastern Conference semifinal playoff with the Charlotte Hornets at Madison Square Garden, their 31-year-old point guard will be cheered for his three overtime 3-pointers in the 109-100 victory on Thursday that eliminated the Indiana Pacers.

"It's been nice," he was saying now, "but we haven't done anything yet."

By anything, Glenn (Doc) Rivers meant everything: winning the National Basketball Association championship that the Knicks envisioned in obtaining him from the Los Angeles Clippers in a trade for Mark Jackson, the championship that after his eight seasons with the Hawks and one with the Clippers is finally attainable.

For the Knicks, the championship is still 12 victories away, but Rivers has blended into Coach Pat Riley's philosophy.

"On defense, the other teams I was on, we switched a lot," he said. "Here you fight your way through the screens."

Here you also better be good if you're known as Doc, which has emerged as a New York nickname demanding success and style.

As a Roosevelt, L.I., teen-ager, Julius Erving once talked about how he wanted to be a doctor. Soon a friend started calling him "Doctor," then he emerged as Dr. J in his Hall of Fame seasons with the Nets of the American Basketball Association and then the Philadelphia 76ers.

Barton Silverman
Doc Rivers

As a Chicago teen-ager, Rivers once wore a "Dr. J" T-shirt at a Milwaukee basketball camp where Rick Majerus, later his Marquette coach, dubbed him "Doc." It stuck.

"I'd never met Julius Erving until my rookie year with the Hawks," Rivers said. "Here I had the same nickname. Some guys might resent that. But before our first game with the Sixers, he walked up to me before the tipoff, shook hands and said, 'Hey, Doc, how you doin'?' I thought it was one of the classiest things I'd ever seen."

Rivers is classy, too. Three years ago, he was voted the J. Walter Kennedy Citizenship Award by the Pro Basketball Writers Association for his dedication to charitable causes, notably the Special Olympics and Sickle Cell Foundation. With the Knicks, he's chairman of their stay-in-school program with inner-city youngsters.

Rivers was known as Doc at Marquette and with the Hawks before young Dwight Gooden's strikeouts created his nickname of Dr. K, if only because it rhymed with Dr. J.

"I've never met Doc Gooden, but he's one of my idols," said Rivers, who is 3 years older than the Mets' right-hander. "When I was with the Hawks, I'd get seats right behind home plate in Atlanta whenever he pitched against the Braves there. Not just to see his fastball, but to see his breaking ball. I used to pitch a little in high school before I decided to concentrate on basketball."

He concentrated mostly on the Chicago Bulls' guards of that era, Jerry Sloan and Norm Van Lier, and the Knicks' pair of Walt Frazier and Earl Monroe.

"I loved Frazier's defense, the way he'd steal the ball at midcourt. He'd even steal it from Jerry West," he said of the Knicks' current radio analyst. "I've asked him about his timing on those steals. Earl Monroe, I just loved his style, the way he played. Van Lier had guts, he'd do anything to win, but Sloan might be the toughest player I've ever seen."

Rivers remembered the tipoff at Pistol Pete Maravich's first game against the Bulls. "When the ball went up, Sloan just ran him over, then Sloan said something to him," Rivers said of the Utah Jazz coach. "It looked like he was saying something nice, but I'm sure it had a knife in it. 'Welcome to the N.B.A.,' something like that."

Some of today's athletes seem reluctant to hear, "Welcome to New York," but Doc Rivers, who lives in Connecticut with his wife, Kris, and their three small children, has adjusted as easily as if he grew up here.

"When I was with the Hawks, one of our assistant coaches was Willis Reed," he said of the Nets general manager, who was the center on the Knicks' championship teams in 1970 and 1973. "Willis always told me, 'The best place to play basketball is in New York.' "

Especially if your nickname is Doc.

Mets Are Their Own Worst Opponent

The Mets do not lose gracefully, or peacefully, or without incident. Vince Coleman lost another fly ball in the left-field sun yesterday afternoon at Shea Stadium. Pete Schourek never got his pitches under control, and the offense managed a pitiful four hits across nine innings. Bobby Bonilla could not even smack the ball out of the infield.

It wasn't enough, though, that New York lost an embarrassing 4-2 game to the Florida Marlins, an expansion club that has already surpassed them in the National League East standings. The Mets had to fight among themselves as well.

Late in the game, Bonilla and Mike Cubbage, the Mets' third-base coach, exchanged heated words — first on the field, and then in the dugout.

The incident started after Cubbage chastised Bonilla for failing to run out Howard Johnson's two-out fly ball to deep right field in the eighth inning. Bonilla had walked, bringing Johnson to the plate. When Junior Felix caught Johnson's drive with his back against the outfield padding, Bonilla was standing halfway between first and second, admiring the drive. Bonilla said afterward that he thought the ball was out of the park. Cubbage did not like that excuse.

"He said he wanted to watch the ball," Cubbage said. "I told him that wasn't his job. If he wants to watch a home run, he can watch it on ESPN tonight."

As is his habit, Bonilla spoke tersely and briefly with reporters after the game, and he refused to give any details of the incident.

"I got caught up," Bonilla said. "I thought Howard hit the ball out, but it didn't

Baseball Breaks With Its Television Past

By RICHARD SANDOMIR

In a deal that ends the tradition of the Saturday Game of the Week and takes CBS out of the business of baseball broadcasting, NBC, ABC and major league baseball have agreed to create a joint revenue-sharing venture to televise baseball entirely in prime time starting next year and through 1999.

Using a wrinkle borrowed from college and pro football broadcasts, the plan calls for all regular-season games and the great majority of playoff games to be regionalized. This means that a viewer in one section of the country will not be able to see a game broadcast to another section.

The regional broadcasts would include an anticipated new round of wild-card playoffs and the league championship series. There will be no more afternoon playoff games, and viewers will be able to see only one game of a league championship series per night until Games 6 and 7 in each series, which will have staggered starts.

Only World Series games will be seen nationally by all viewers.

The plan, which was created by baseball's television committee, is subject to approval at an owners meeting Thursday in Chicago.

The proposed deal represents a significant departure from previous television contracts for baseball and other professional sports. For the first time, baseball will not receive an upfront rights payment. Instead, baseball and the two networks will form a joint venture and create a separate company to sell advertising on the broadcasts.

Islanders Ride Wave At Coliseum

UNIONDALE, L.I., May 8 — The Islanders have a chance, just a do-they-dare-believe-it chance to upset the Pittsburgh Penguins, the two-time champions, and oust them from the Stanley Cup playoffs. Their odds got better tonight when they beat the Penguins, 6-5, in a wild one amid the fury and the din of Nassau Coliseum. The victory evened the four-of-seven Patrick Division final series at two games each.

Among the Islander heroes was Derek King, who broke out of his post-season slump with two goals, including the winner. Another was Tom Fitzgerald, who scored two shorthanded goals on the same Pittsburgh power play. A third was Ray Ferraro, who scored his 11th goal in 10 post-season games, most in the league. A fourth was Vladimir Malakhov, the rookie defenseman from Russia, who scored the other goal and added one assist and played a dynamic game at both ends of the ice.

Still, the key figure in the series remains Mario Lemieux, the best player on the Penguins and in the league, who is suffering with back pain and playing very little. Although Lemeiux set up a power-play goal, he appeared tentative on most of his rare shifts and was on the ice for both of Fitzger-

ROUND 2: KNICKS VS. HORNETS

Knicks Looking to Walk, Not Run

Charles Oakley will have his hands full under the boards with Larry Johnson and Alonzo Mourning of the Hornets.

In some ways they are similar. In most ways, they are different. But during the next two weeks, the Knicks and the Charlotte Hornets will be enemies. And the survivor of their second-round, four-of-seven-game playoff series will be one step closer to a National Basketball Association championship.

"Charlotte has picked its game up to a whole new level," Knicks Coach Pat Riley said yesterday after the Knicks' three-hour practice to prepare for Game 1 of the series, this afternoon at Madison Square Garden (Channel 4, 3 P.M.).

"They're going to come at us with a lot of energy and a lot of enthusiasm. Their style of play can blow you out, but I think their style of play can also let you get back into the game. That's why you can never stop playing against them. You just have to keep working. It's going to take great effort and concentration on our part."

The Knicks, who have the home-court advantage, more experience and more depth, will be expected to win. But the Hornets, in the playoffs for the first time in their five-year history, have already gone farther than most people expected. They won their last five regular-season games to capture the No. 5 seeding in the East, then knocked off the Boston Celtics in the first round of the playoffs.

Not only do the Hornets have an All-Star forward in Larry Johnson, they have a dominant center in Alonzo Mourning to confront Patrick Ewing.

There are many obvious key matchups in this series: Ewing versus Mourning, Johnson versus the Knicks' front line. But other factors will be equally important.

TEMPO The Hornets want a fast-break,

Potholes on Parquet: Celtics Search for Blueprint of Bright Future

By MALCOLM MORAN
Special to The New York Times

BOSTON, May 8 — Now Red.

Red Auerbach is in the hospital. What can happen next?

In a world uncomplicated by salary caps and free-agency, long before the Celtics became fashionable enough to fill Boston Garden on a regular basis, the stress of springtime would disappear in an annual puff of Auerbach's celebratory cigar smoke. As surely as the swan boats would return to the Public Garden, playoff basketball would be elevated to an art form and another championship banner would be raised to join a glorious collection in those sooty rafters above the parquet floor.

But as the Celtics reel from their latest setback, the shocking discovery that a heart condition had threatened the life of 27-year-old captain Reggie Lewis, the tension of crisis management is pushing the organization into another early vacation.

The stress of a season of passage, controversy, embarrassment, inspiration, despair and pain reached another heightened level of concern when Auerbach, the organization's 75-year-old president and patriarch, admitted himself to Massachusetts General Hospital late Friday night with chest discomfort.

> It has been seven years since Boston's last title.

Jeff Twiss, a team spokesman, said Auerbach felt lightheaded after the organization's annual breakup dinner, was not in pain or danger and was undergoing precautionary tests that were expected to last at least until tomorrow.

The Celtics can only cling to a handwritten message on a dressing-room wall from last Wednesday, the night Charlotte ended their season by handing Boston its third first-round playoff defeat in five seasons. A painful year has been left behind. A difficult transition period appears imminent. A reminder remains:

"STAY CALM. STAY TOGETHER."

That these Celtics are seven years removed from Boston's most recent championship era, its 16th N.B.A. title in 1986, has made that task more and more difficult with each passing day.

Lewis's immediate and long-term future remains unclear. A decision to allow him to return to Game 1 against Charlotte after a baffling collapse has raised fundamental questions about medical care for athletes. The decision was encouraged by Lewis, made by team physician Arnold Scheller and approved by senior executive vice president Dave Gavitt.

The Boston Globe reported yesterday that Lewis was to have surgery, possibly this weekend, to have a defibrillating device implanted with the hope that he could resume his career.

Testing on Lewis Continues

But Louise Homer, a spokesperson for Brigham and Women's Hospital, said yesterday that the report was inaccurate and that the testing and evaluation process has not been completed. Another source close to Lewis, who would speak only on the condition of anonymity, would not rule out the possibility of surgery, but said a decision had not been made.

The uncertainly surrounding Lewis, the 22d pick in the 1987 draft and a jewel in a collection of recent Celtic choices that were mere imitations, is the most serious development in a period of decline.

Boston has endured the retirements of Larry Bird and, now, Kevin McHale. Robert Parish, the last of Boston's Big Three if he signs a new contract, was found in possession of marijuana in February. Alaa Abdelnaby, who was acquired from Milwaukee in December faced a misdemeanor charge of marijuana possession from his time with the Bucks.

Ed Pinckney's season was ended after seven games by surgery to his left knee. Sherman Douglas left the team temporarily in December for personal reasons. John Bagley's infant son died as the result of a heart problem last month. Rookie forward Marcus Webb was released by the team in March, hours before being arrested on an aggravated rape charge. Webb was subsequently indicted on two counts of rape.

Memory of Bias

And not far from the surface of the collective Celtic memory is the knowledge that Len Bias, whose drug-induced death took place the day after Boston made him their No. 1 selection in the 1986 draft, could have been finishing his seventh season and entering his prime.

Parish, the 7-foot-½-inch center, will turn 40 in August. His agent, Bob Wolff, said he was told by the Celtics on Friday that a contract should be settled soon, and would have been already if not for Lewis's condition.

As Parish dressed at the end of the season in Charlotte, he was asked about the future of the franchise. "I haven't given it much thought, to tell you the truth," he said. "But now that you mention it, it doesn't look real bright right now.

"We've got some talented young players, but it's going to take more than that to be competitive in this league. But you never know what's going on behind closed doors. You don't know what abracadabra Red will come up with."

Now Auerbach is in Mass General. The problem for all those believers in Celtic green is that the National Basketball Association's growth into a sophisticated global entertainment business has eliminated magic from the mix. "We're not a free-market society anymore," said Gavitt, the former commissioner of the Big East conference who joined the Celtics nearly three years ago. "It's not I.B.M. and Wang competing against each other.

"It's the power company and the water company," Gavitt said. "They have to get the public utilities commission to approve their rates. We have to live within this managed economy of the salary cap. So it's not as easy as it was to rebuild a team."

Complex Task Becomes Nightmare

The complexity of Gavitt's task, combined with the intense expectations of a simpler time, became a nightmare last week. Lewis had passed a strenuous treadmill test April 28, three days before the playoff opener against Charlotte. He scored 10 points in the first three minutes. But then, Lewis collapsed face forward as he ran down the floor.

The day before the fourth and what turned out to be final game of the Charlotte series, the Celtics held a 20-minute meeting before practice. Chris Ford, the Boston coach, said the discussion was about basketball.

"And life," Ford said.

It was also indirectly about death. Gavitt sensed three emotions during the meeting, including a concern for Lewis and the need to make adjustments.

"The third was their own mortality," Gavitt remembered on Friday.

"These guys had just taken a stress test with Reggie and Reggie passed with flying colors, and they all did, too," he said. "And they all practiced hard with him for three days and all of a sudden . . . "

He did not finish the thought.

Gavitt had planned to return from Charlotte on Tuesday to visit Lewis. The visit did not happen until Thursday, after the season had ended. Rick Fox was leaving the hospital as Gavitt appeared. Joe Kleine was arriving. "I felt good laying my eyes on him," Gavitt remembered. "You felt better seeing him. I don't think he ever wants to hear the word 'test' again."

But, the springtime hope of the Celtics now rests with hospital test results.

A day before the season was ended, as Gavitt sat outside a dressing room in Charlotte discussing the recent ordeal, he casually began to light up. This was no celebratory cigar, just a plain cigarette. A distressing spring had transformed an act of Celtic triumph into a stressful release. Hadn't he stopped smoking a long time ago?

"I did," Gavitt said, "for a while."

Knicks Must Control the Pace to Keep Moving On end-to-end, no-speed-limit game. The Knicks want a half-court, walk-it-up pace that will allow their defense to dictate the game. Whichever team gets the tempo it wants most often will go a long way toward winning.

In the regular season, Charlotte was the second-highest-scoring team in the N.B.A. (110.1 points per game average), while New York had the league's stingiest defense (95.4 points). The Hornets score in flurries, with Muggsy Bogues pushing the ball upcourt even after opponents score. If a quick shot isn't there, the Hornets shift into a motion offense with plenty of passing and back-door cuts.

In its first-round series, New York didn't react well to the Indiana Pacers' up-tempo offense. New York gave up more layups than normal, and Reggie Miller freed himself for open jumpers. If the Knicks give the Hornets layups and give Dell Curry open jumpers, Charlotte will score over 100 points regularly and New York will be in trouble.

"I'm concerned about our defensive disposition," Riley said recently. "Last year, we went against Detroit in the first round, a team that wanted to walk it up and play a half-court game. Our defense really locked in. But the Pacers' style gives us more problems."

But if the Knicks eliminate easy opportunities, they have a chance to shut down Charlotte's offense. And although the Hornets can score, they can also be scored upon. Only Dallas, Golden State and Sacramento gave up more points per game than the Hornets (110.4).

New York wants to fast-break, but only when the opportunity presents itself. The Knicks have confidence that Ewing can score against Mourning. And the Knicks believe that if they execute their offense with patience, Charlotte will give up good shots. The Knicks shot 50.1 percent against Charlotte this season, and John Starks (24.5 points, 53.8 percent shooting) played like an All-Star. So the Knicks figure if they can control the tempo, they can control the series.

OUTSIDE SHOOTING Perimeter shooting will be crucial for both teams, because both teams have centers who command double-team respect.

The Hornets will give Mourning help against Ewing, which will leave other players open. Indiana swarmed around Ewing in the final minutes of Game 4, leaving Doc Rivers wide open for three overtime 3-pointers that clinched the series. Rivers, Starks, Greg Anthony, Charles Smith and Rolando Blackman must make enough outside shots to allow Ewing room to operate on Mourning.

Curry is the heart of the Hornets' perimeter game, but they will also need jumpers from Kendall Gill and Bogues. Most teams dare Bogues to shoot jumpers until he makes a few.

When Curry gets on a roll, the Hornets are almost impossible to contain, but the Knicks held him to a 12-point average during the regular season. Curry is Charlotte's only consistent scorer off the bench. If he is cold, then the Knicks will be free to focus on stopping Johnson and Mourning in the low post.

INTANGIBLES Rebounding is a major key. In their four games in the regular season, three of which were won by New York, the team with more rebounds won. The Knicks may be the league's most physical team, but that should not be a big factor against the Hornets. Johnson and Mourning aren't intimidated by anyone. But the Knicks' experience may give them an edge, especially late in the series.

The Hornets almost lost Game 4 against Boston after blowing a 19-point second-half lead. Johnson, Mourning and Gill are all under 25 years old and have never been in a playoff game until this year.

Finally, each team's key players must maintain their poise. Technical fouls, ejections and head-butting can change the momentum in the playoffs.

Both teams expect an interesting series. They are not likely to be disappointed.

Who Will Get Stung?

The second round matchup between Charlotte and the Knicks with averages from the four regular-season games and comments and an edge (✔) by Clifton Brown.

	KNICKS		HORNETS
GUARD	DOC RIVERS ✔ Pts. 8.8 Assists 6.3 Can exploit 14-inch height advantage if he's not rattled by Bogues' quickness.		MUGGSY BOGUES Pts. 8.3 Assists 6 The match that ignites Hornets' potent fast break. But will he make open jumpers?
GUARD	JOHN STARKS ✔ Pts. 24.6 Assists 6.8 If he keeps poise, his overall game should be difficult to control. The key matchup?		KENDALL GILL Pts. 14.8 Assists 4 Gill must make Starks work defensively and take away Starks's jumper.
CENTER	PATRICK EWING ✔ Pts. 35 Rebs. 11.8 Has greater arsenal of offensive moves and more experience, but Mourning represents a major test. A dream matchup.		ALONZO MOURNING Pts. 24.8 Rebs. 12.3 Must avoid foul trouble, take good shots, and find open man when double-teamed.
FORWARD	CHARLES OAKLEY Pts. 7.3 Rebs. 8 Can't allow Johnson to rest at defensive end.		✔ LARRY JOHNSON Pts. 25 Rebs. 7.3 Unstoppable unless he's double-teamed. Superb at drawing fouls.
FORWARD	CHARLES SMITH ✔ Pts. 10.8 Rebs. 7 Must utilize three-inch height advantage and avoid foul trouble.		JOHNNY NEWMAN Pts. 6 Rebs. 1.3 Dangerous in the open court, but is inconsistent.
BENCH	A. MASON, G. ANTHONY ✔ Knicks have better depth. Anthony Mason is huge key, both with offense and defense, against Johnson. Greg Anthony will see more action to counter Bogues's quickness.		D. CURRY, K. GATTISON Dell Curry is one of league's best shooters, but he's streaky. Must be a factor for Hornets to win. Kenny Gattison is a good rebounder who will guard Ewing when Mourning doesn't.
COACH	PAT RILEY ✔ Career playoffs 111-54 Has more experience, more poise, and players have confidence in his preparation.		ALLAN BRISTOW Career playoffs 3-1 Emotional on the bench, which can be good or bad, depending upon situation.

✔ KNICKS IN SIX PREDICTION

Hornets are extremely talented and have no pressure on them in underdog role. They'll win two games with their offensive firepower, but Knicks' defense, depth, and experience will move them into next round.

Rockets Hold Off Clippers to Enter the Next Realm

By The Associated Press

Rockets 84, Clippers 80

Hakeem Olajuwon provided the muscle and Vernon Maxwell the inspiration that got the host Houston Rockets into the second round of the National Basketball Association playoffs.

Olajuwon had 31 points, 21 rebounds and 7 blocks as the Rockets beat the Los Angeles Clippers, 84-80, yesterday to win their series, 3-2.

Trailing, 79-70, the Clippers scored 10 straight points to take an 80-79 lead on Ron Harper's layup with 1 minute 17 seconds. But Maxwell, in his second game back since breaking his wrist April 17, made a 3-pointer with 56 seconds left to put Houston ahead for good.

"I never got too much out of shape," said Maxwell, who scored 13 points after missing his first 7 shots. "I've got a lot of confidence in my game. That's the way I am."

Kenny Smith clinched the victory with a breakway dunk with 33 seconds remaining. The Rockets, reaching the second round for the first time since 1987, will play Seattle in the Western Conference semifinals.

"This is a good feeling," said Smith, who scored 19 points. "We deserve it because we earned it. They came back but we did, too."

Otis Thorpe had 17 rebounds and 12 points for the Rockets.

Danny Manning paced the Clippers with 24 points and 12 rebounds. Harper, who hurt his knee early in the game, finished with 19 points.

Olajuwon got a bloody nose in the first quarter and had to leave the game briefly. When he returned, he scored 8 consecutive points.

The Rockets are 9-0 in playoff series after winning the first game.

SuperSonics 100, Jazz 92

The Seattle SuperSonics acquired Sam Perkins in a February trade with the Los Angeles Lakers for his inside scoring and leadership. Yesterday, he gave them something else — long-distance shooting.

Perkins made four 3-pointers and the Sonics rallied after a horrible first half to beat the Utah Jazz and win their first-round playoff series, 3-2.

After tying a franchise playoff worst with 30 points in the first half, Seattle matched a team playoff best with 70 points in the second half to advance to the Western Conference semifinals against the Houston Rockets.

"We had to do something real quick in the second half," said Perkins, who had 20 points and 13 rebounds.

Utah was eliminated in the first round after reaching the Western Conference finals last season.

"The Sonics did a great job," Jazz Coach Jerry Sloan said. "I guess we'll see you next season."

Seattle Coach George Karl moved the 6-9½, 257-pound Perkins into the starting lineup after Game 1.

"I don't know if he's a center or a point guard," Karl said. "He's damn good. He carried us confidence-wise early in the third quarter."

Teammate Nate McMillan said the Sonics' acquisition of Perkins for Benoit Benjamin and the rights to top draft choice Doug Christie was a key factor in Seattle's ability to beat a Utah team that eliminated the Sonics from last year's playoffs.

"He's the ultimate team player," McMillan said. "He kept our confidence up at halftime and then came out and hit the big shots."

Perkins was 4 of 8 from 3-point range, making 3 of the long-range shots in the first 3:22 of the second half. He scored 11 points in the third quarter as the Sonics turned a 39-30 halftime deficit into a 69-57 lead.

Nets Fans Are Asking: Who's Laughing Now?

By MIKE FREEMAN
Special to The New York Times

RICHFIELD, Ohio, May 8 — At one point during the Nets' victory over the Cleveland Cavaliers in New Jersey on Friday night, Derrick Coleman jumped onto the scorer's table, waving his hands high. The crowd responded by raising the decibel level to highs not heard at Byrne Meadowlands Arena in a long time.

Later, Dwayne Schintzius, who has turned into a virtual folk hero during this first-round playoff series, was asked the last time he got so many cheers. "When I was cut by Sacramento," he joked.

The Nets are still alive, and that's no joke. No one knows how. No one knows why. But with their 96-79 victory in Game 4, the injury-plagued Nets tied the series at two games apiece with the fifth and deciding game to be played here Sunday afternoon. And in a strange sort of way, all of the pressure is now on the Cavaliers, who were given a good chance to sweep the Nets when the series started.

Pressure on Cleveland

If Cleveland — a team whose players all season talked about how they would challenge Chicago and New York for the Eastern Conference title — ends up losing the series to the Nets, the season will be considered an embarrassing failure. That fact creates a lot of pressure, and the Cavaliers have shown in this series that they don't handle pressure very well.

"Let's get ready to rumble," Coleman said.

What makes all of this so startling for the Nets is that they are in this 2-2 tie with one of the top five teams in the league, having to go with a fourth-string center, Schintzius, because starting center Sam Bowie is out with a sprained left ankle, because the normal backup, Chris Dudley, has a stress fracture in his left foot, and because Rick Mahorn has been ailing with the flu and limited in the minutes he can play.

Then, of course, there is Kenny Anderson (broken left wrist) and Jayson Williams (broken left fibula), both of them spectators on the bench.

And there's more. Chris Morris played on Friday night with a very sore right hip. Rumeal Robinson has a sore big toe and a sprained left thumb. Drazen Petrovic is still recovering from a torn ligament in his knee. Call them the walking wounded. But somehow they have been getting the job done.

What's That Crashing Sound?

"You couldn't ask for anything better," Morris said. "We were crashing the boards. It was a team effort and we had to pull it together. You feel the energy people are giving us."

Mahorn said: "I'm going to miss Mother's Day this weekend. But I don't want an early vacation."

How have the Nets done it? Here are three reasons:

¶Defense — Coleman, who is making those who failed to put him on the Eastern Conference All-Star team think twice, had another great game, scoring 21 points, grabbing 14 rebounds and dishing out 8 assists. He also set the tone defensively by blocking a club-record nine shots. Schintzius added three blocks. "Derrick Coleman was big around the basket," said Nets Coach Chuck Daly.

¶Fast breaks — With the Nets' defense clicking and the players dominating the boards — they outrebounded the Cavaliers by 14 — they were able to get a ton of fast-break baskets. That led to two crushing runs by the Nets. With the score at 32-31, New Jersey went on a 23-10 run to finish out the half with a 55-41 halftime lead. But the most crushing run was a 29-6 blast to end the third quarter and put the game out of reach.

¶Teamwork — Coleman has been great, but in Game 1 he didn't have much help offensively. In the last few games, Morris, Petrovic, Robinson, Maurice Cheeks and Schintzius have all stepped up their games. Petrovic finally looks like the normal Petrovic and Morris was outstanding in Game 4, scoring 22 points and grabbing 10 rebounds.

All of these things contribute to the overall picture: that the Nets have a realistic chance to win this series when no one believed they had any shot at all.

The fact that the Nets are still in this is testimony to how they have come together to overcome their injuries. It is also a tribute to the great play of Coleman and the coaching skills of Daly, who deserves to be mentioned as a coach-of-the-year candidate.

"We knew they weren't going to lie down," said Cleveland center Brad Daugherty. "They have a good basketball team with a lot of weapons. You can't harp on their injuries, because they have a lot of depth with a great coaching staff. But we'll be ready to play Sunday."

Boomer and Browning Discuss Basics

By GERALD ESKENAZI

HEMPSTEAD, L.I., May 8 — Boomer Esiason and Browning Nagle have a pact.

"We've played golf together," Esiason, the 32-year-old veteran, said today as the two players attended their first minicamp as competing Jets quarterbacks. "We talked about realistic things. I said, 'Look, Browning, the reality is they brought me here for whatever reason. Our lockers are going to be right next to each other. I won't back-stab you.' "

And so, in the glow of springtime, there is no quarterback "situation" for the Jets — at least not to speak of.

Ready, Set, Make the Calls

Here is Boomer, with his three-day stubble of beard, talking confidently about how "I could step in the huddle right now and call the game plan."

And why not. With Super Bowl experience and a full career of nine seasons at Cincinnati behind him, he has rejoined his old Bengals quarterbacks coach, Bruce Coslet, the Jets' head coach.

Nagle, the youngster who last season could not overcome repeated mental and physical errors when entrusted with the Jets, spoke more softly today than the always-confident Esiason.

"Of course, the competition is going to be there," said Nagle, who will be entering his third pro season. "That's the reason they brought him in, so that the Jets get better. I expect a tremendous amount of improvement, to be head and shoulders above where I was last year."

Playing a Patience Game

And how would he do that?

"By learning patience," said the 25-year-old Nagle. "Everything was pushed last year. Everything was accelerated. I forgot some of the finer points: passing techniques, footwork. It all gets down to X's and O's. It's all got to be natural."

It helps when there's an offensive line in front of you, and right now the left side of the line — at least, the one that started for the Jets for most of last season — has the only two no-shows at camp.

Tackle Jeff Criswell and guard Dave Cadigan, both of whom lost their No. 1 spots late last season, apparently are unhappy even though they have contracts. Neither one is here. Matt Willig replaced Criswell at left tackle today and promptly dislocated a finger.

Esiason, who came to the Jets in March by a trade, addressed the Criswell-Cadigan situation as if he had been here for years, as if he were running the team. He knows about flawed offensive lines; he was unhappy the last two seasons at Cincinnati with a second-rate offensive line.

"As a player that's new here, I think those guys should be here if they're signed," Esiason said. "When we find out what the reason is, if it's unrealistic, then it's important for someone to get over there and find out what they're doing."

Criswell and Cadigan are both represented by Leigh Steinberg, noted more as the lawyer for many of the top quarterbacks. Steinberg could not be reached for comment today.

Criswell would have backed in as the starting left tackle in camp since Siupeli Malamala has switched over to the right side.

Both he and Cadigan are being fined about $1,000 a day, but have not told the Jets why they are staying away. They have not asked to renegotiate their contracts or be traded.

Meanwhile, Esiason knows a quarterback story when he sees one. The native of East Islip, L.I., conceded that when football season rolls around people will open their papers "and the Jeff Torborg thing will be over and they'll have us to write about."

EXTRA POINTS

BOOMER ESIASON explained his contract change, from $2.7 million this season to a base of $1.7 million (with a complicated $1 million bonus arrangement). This could have had an impact on the contract the Jets were able to give JAMES HASTY, who had received an offer from the Bengals, but Esiason contended he had been working on redoing his pact soon after he joined the Jets.

HORSE RACING

Sky Beauty Runs to Daylight in The Acorn

By JOSEPH DURSO

Sky Beauty made a smashing return to New York racing yesterday when she won the Acorn Stakes at Belmont Park by more than five lengths over Educated Risk and went up by one in the Triple Tiara series for 3-year-old fillies.

Eliza wasn't there, and Dispute wasn't there. But they will be there one day soon, challenging Sky Beauty for the championship of their class. Meanwhile, five other fillies of some distinction were there, but none came close to Sky Beauty as she finished first for the fifth time in six starts.

In fact, it was more of a solo performance than a contest. She was running alone far in front with Mike Smith, flashing one mile in 1:35⅔, carrying 121 pounds over a fast track, with lots of daylight back to Educated Risk and In Her Glory.

'Awesome' Is the Word

"Sky Beauty was just awesome," said Shug McGaughey, who trains Educated Risk and Dispute for Ogden Mills Phipps. "I'm pleased with the way my filly ran, but there was no getting by Sky Beauty."

Scotty Schulhofer, who trains In Her Glory for the Bask Stable, put it this way: "My filly ran her heart out. But I'll have to find a spot for her where she doesn't have to run up against Sky Beauty."

H. Allen Jerkens, who trains Sky Beauty for Georgia E. Hoffman, said his star was "a really classy filly," and said she would perform next in the Mother Goose Stakes on June 6, the second race in the series. The third is the Coaching Club American Oaks on July 11.

Mike Smith gave an even more rousing view from the saddle, saying, "She goes along, and you don't think she's doing much, and you look back and she's just annihilating the field."

A Fast Starter

None of this came as a surprise to the betting public, which made Sky Beauty the 2-5 favorite. She paid a token $2.80 for $2 to win in taking $90,000 of the purse of $150,000.

Sky Beauty, a daughter of Blushing Groom and a granddaughter of Nijinsky II, came into prominence last year when she won her first five starts, although she was disqualified to third in the Spinaway at Saratoga. But she came back to win the Matron Stakes at Belmont in September, and then took a sabbatical to heal an inflamed ankle.

In her return this year after a layoff of six months, she was outrun by three-quarters of a length by Dispute in the Bonnie Miss Stakes at Gulfstream Park in Florida. Then she rested for the Acorn while Dispute outran the 1992 juvenile champion Eliza in the Kentucky Oaks.

In the Mother Goose, the challenge will be joined when Sky Beauty gets another crack at Dispute.

While the fillies of the present were taking their first cracks at the Triple Tiara, one of the leading fillies of the past was making her first start in nine months. She didn't win, but she did remind people that she was the star of the series one year ago.

Turnback the Alarm, who ran third in the Acorn and won both the Mother Goose and the Coaching Club American Oaks, had looked like the 3-year-old filly champion of 1992 until she fractured a bone in her right hind leg last August. She underwent surgery and was sent to Florida for a long rest by her owner, the Valley View Farm.

She made her first start since then in the first race at Belmont yesterday, and ran third behind Makin Faces and Lady Sage. The time for the six furlongs was 1:10 flat and Turnback the Alarm finished within two lengths of the winner.

Next: the Shuvee Handicap for fillies and mares at a mile and one-sixteenth on May 22.

FINISH LINES

The vigil was continuing at Three Chimneys Farm in Midway, Ky., for that great old filly star of the deeper past, Genuine Risk, winner of the 1980 Kentucky Derby, now 16 years old and close to delivering her first live foal after 13 years of misfortunes. Three Chimneys reported yesterday that Genuine Risk was still sound and serene in the 353d day of her pregnancy, which seemed likely to end at any moment.

CYCLING

Reaching for Top Rung From the Seat of a Bike

By FRANK LITSKY
Special to The New York Times

HAGERSTOWN, Md., May 8 — At one end of professional cycling's earnings spectrum are such kings of the road as Greg LeMond, Miguel Indurain, Pedro Delgado and Gianni Bugno, who make $1 million a year or more in salary apiece and maybe as much for endorsements. At the other end are the journeymen who struggle through 100 to 150 races a year, 500 to 600 miles of training a week and happily exist on $20,000 a year.

Steve Hegg has the credentials to be among the big earners: Olympic gold and silver medals in 1984, Pan American Games gold medals in 1983 and 1987, nine United States titles, 11 victories last year. He is a Californian with blond hair and a wonderful nickname, Golden Boy.

But at age 29, for all his achievements and skills, Golden Boy is still short of the top rung. He rides for the Chevrolet-L.A. Sheriff team for $35,000 to $40,000 a year plus a few thousand in incentive bonuses.

Twice Caught, Once Stymied

Today, he was one of the 116 professionals and amateurs in a 115.7-mile road race from Port Deposit, Md., part of the 11-day Tour DuPont. The winner was 32-year-old Sean Yates of Britain, riding for the American team Motorola.

Typically, Hegg was active. Late in the race, he was one of two leaders who broke away, only to have the pack reel them in three or four miles later. With eight miles to go, he was in a short breakaway group that was caught. In the last mile, with a chance for a top-five finish, a crash in front of him brought him almost to a stop, and he finished 42d in the pack. He stands 15th over all.

Hegg is quick to criticize his sport and quick to defend it. But he is hopelessly consumed by it. Cycling owns him.

'Scared to Death'

"I've been nervous for a week because this is the biggest race in America," he said. "I've been thinking about it all year. I'm scared to death. It would be icing on the cake to have a stage win like last year. It would make life a lot easier.

"Years ago, I was too young to know better. When you're young, you don't know what your limitations are. You'd jump your bike over anything. Now I don't jump my bike over anything."

But there is still a gung-ho attitude that manifests itself best in time trials, where it's one man against the clock. In Thursday night's prologue time trial, Hegg finished fifth. In last year's concluding time trial in Washington, he won and never got the attention he deserved.

That day was typical of Hegg's fortunes. On a bumpy course past the Capitol, the Washington Monument and the Lincoln Memorial, he won by two minutes. But LeMond finished third and won the overall title, and the V.I.P.'s and spectators clutched at America's Hero and ignored Golden Boy.

No matter how well Hegg does, the glory usually goes somewhere else.

SHIFTING GEARS

With two and a half miles to go in Saturday's race, SEAN YATES of Britain broke away and won by 10 yards over ROY KNICKMAN of Boulder, Colo., and Coors Light. JIM COPELAND of Winston-Salem, N.C., and Chevrolet-L.A. Sheriff finished third. The time was 5 hours 6 minutes 46 seconds. In the overall standing, JELLE NIJDAM of the Netherlands maintained a 10-second lead over RAUL ALCALA of Mexico, his WordPerfect teammate. The crash near the finish left JEAN-PIERRE HEYNDERICKX of Belgium with a bruised left arm and NATE REISS of Boulder with a scraped right arm. Heyndericks will undergo X-rays.

TRACK AND FIELD

Indoor Championships To Leave the Garden

By FILIP BONDY

USA Track & Field will announce tomorrow that it is moving the USA/Mobil national indoor track and field championships next March from Madison Square Garden to the Georgia Dome in Atlanta.

Although USA Track & Field has four more years on its contract with the Garden, Paul Munick, vice president of athletics for Madison Square Garden, said an "amicable divorce" had been finalized. "It is done," he said. "I don't like to lose any event at Madison Square Garden, but it got to the point where this was the mutually best move. Attendance has been declining."

The new deal, involving USA Track & Field and the Georgia Dome, will be for 10 years. Mobil, which also agreed to the move, will remain a sponsor of the event, at least through 1996. A 200-meter synthetic track will be built for the Georgia Dome, with the possible aid of the Atlanta Committee for the Olympic Games.

Garden Track a Factor

The move originally was prompted by complaints from athletes about the short, 146.3-meter track at the Garden, but also represents an ambitious new strategy by USA Track & Field to place several American meets inside large, domed arenas.

The Georgia Dome, which will be the site of the 1994 Super Bowl, opened last August.

The national indoor track and field championships is a meet with a historic link to New York City. Since it originated in New York in 1888, the meet has always been held in the city except during a four-year span from 1966-69. The first national indoor championships at Madison Square Garden in 1888 featured such events as "kicking a football for accuracy," a standing high jump and a standing broad jump.

"Track and field is not leaving New York," insisted Larry Ellis, president of USA Track and Field. "We still have the Millrose Games and the New York Games."

The Millrose meet has traditionally been more popular in New York than the national indoor championships, which has suffered at the gate during recent years. But if a domed stadium moves from the blueprint stage to reality at the Meadowlands over the next decade, there is a chance that even the Millrose Games might move out of the city.

I.R.A. Regatta To New Jersey

SYRACUSE (AP) — The 1993 Intercollegiate Rowing Association Regatta will be held in New Jersey on the Cooper River.

The I.R.A. Regatta, first held in 1895 and one of collegiate rowing's most prestigious championships, has been held on Onondaga Lake since 1952. But severe flooding there and throughout central New York forced officials to find an alternate location for this year's races.

The three-day regatta will be held as scheduled on June 3-5, said Clayton Chapman, commissioner of the Eastern College Athletic Conference.

Prost Wins Pole. For Race in Spain

BARCELONA, Spain, May 8 (AP) — Alain Prost of France won his fifth consecutive pole position today, breaking the qualifying record for the Spanish Grand Prix. The three-time world champion, in a Williams-Renault, toured the 2.95-mile Circuit of Catalunya course in 1 minute 17.809 seconds, an average of 136.5 miles per hour.

Prost's teammate, Damon Hill, was timed in 1:18.346 for second place, after leading practice for most of the one-hour session. Three-time world champion Ayrton Senna of Brail was third in 1:19.722.

Prost and Hill broke the qualifying record of 1:18.751 set by Gerhard Berger of Austria in a McLaren-Honda in 1991. Michael Schumacher of Germany was fourth in 1:20.520 in a Benetton-Ford.

Lewis Defeats Tucker In First Title Defense

By TOM FRIEND
Special to The New York Times

LAS VEGAS, Nev., May 8 — Lennox Lewis had a championship belt before he ever had a championship fight, so few trusted his wherewithal until tonight. Wielding a strong right hand, he floored Tony Tucker in the third round, kept status quo through the seventh round, assaulted Tucker unmercifully in the eighth and ninth and breathed far too heavily the remainder of the evening.

He won the 12-round decision, in the first defense of his World Boxing Council Heavyweight title, but his hands were held dangerously low the final three rounds — out of exhaustion.

Winding up like a baseball pitcher, Lewis put Tucker down early in the ninth round and then literally chased after him, swinging wildly, when Tucker arose. While it was all quite entertaining and vicious, Lewis likely wore himself out.

The decision wasn't close. Judge Jerry Roth of Las Vegas scored it 117-111 for Lewis, while the British judges, Mickey Vann and Harry Gibbs, saw it 118-111 and 116-112, respectively.

Chávez Retains Title

Earlier, undefeated Julio César Chávez retained his W.B.C. superlightweight championship with a sixth-round knockout that ended in confusion, Gerald McClellan took away Julian Jackson's W.B.C. middleweight belt in five rounds and Hector (Macho) Camacho, in his first bout since his scrap in Mexico against Chávez, delivered a fifth-round knockout.

Lewis looked potent at times and lunged awkwardly at others. In his last fight, on Halloween, he had looked smooth and worldly as he knocked out Donovan (Razor) Ruddock in London. But tonight was so categorically different that Lewis's mother crept close after the 10th round to get a bird's-eye view of her son's face.

Lewis, 27 years old and now 23-0, earned $9 million before taxes. Tucker, 33 and now 48-2, earned $3 million. His only previous loss was to Mike Tyson in 1987, another 12-round decision, but Tyson did not knock Tucker down or swell his face this much.

"I'd rate it a 7 out of 10 — I didn't put enough punches together," said Lewis. "I thought I had him going a few times, but he showed a lot of guts. Nobody can take a punch like Tucker."

Tucker said: "I still think I'm a better fighter than he is. I should have won the fight, but no excuses. I couldn't get my jab working and that kind of threw me off. I should have taken it to him more. I'm going to get right back in training."

Fans Across the Water

Tucker had entered the ring in red, white and blue — playing up the American versus Englishman theme. And it certainly was a mixed crowd, with some Lewis fans coming from as far away as Liverpool. Lewis is the first British heavyweight champion since the 19th century and certainly more of the 15,000 people at the Thomas and Mack Center favored Lewis than Tucker.

Lewis, meanwhile, entered the ring to reggae music, wearing a pullover bearing the British flag. His family was seated behind his corner, but not after somewhat of a fiasco. Fight promotors originally put Lewis's family and friends behind Tucker's corner and Tucker's confidants behind Lewis's corner. They gladly switched places.

Tucker was eventually introduced as "The new Tony TNT Tucker," but the only new element was that he was knocked down twice for the first time in his career.

It was the second time Tucker has been forced to go 10 rounds or more.

Few Boos for Chávez

Mexican folk hero Chávez rarely hears boos, but his fight earlier tonight ended to a tune of jeers. Not that anyone disputed Chávez's knockout here of Terrence Alli 45 seconds into the sixth round; it was just the tentative way the referee, Carlos Padilla, waved it off.

Chávez, 87-0 and still the W.B.C. super-lightweight champion, had twice jarred Alli's mouthpiece onto the canvas and dominated the bout to the point that Alli was in constant retreat. Just 11 seconds into the sixth round, Chávez finally floored Alli with a six-punch flurry, the last blow being a left hand.

The 32-year-old Alli, a Georgetown, Guyana, native who bet his life savings of $2,000 on himself to win, climbed back up but was soon the victim of another Chávez barrage. Padilla took notice of it and seemed to step between the two fighters. Chávez took it to mean Padilla was stopping the bout, turned and walked away.

On Second Thought

Alli, who did not seem drastically injured, begged to continue and Padilla relented and waved him toward Chávez. At that moment, though, Padilla peeked and saw that Chávez was almost to his stool. Although not emphatically, he then decided to end the fight once and for all.

"I was in the fight," said Alli (52-8-2), who growled after each of his punches tonight.

Afterward, Chávez fussed more than Alli. "I didn't like the way the referee handled the fight," Chávez said. "I didn't like the knockdown count."

Earlier, in a fight where hardly a single punch was blocked, Gerald McClellan had more in his arsenal than Julian Jackson and captured his second world title. Jackson, who came in as the W.B.C. middleweight champion, has been known universally as a premier knockout fighter, what with 43 knockouts in 46 fights. Now he knows how the other half lives.

Against McClellan (28-2, 26 knockouts), it took only 20 seconds of the first round for Jackson to be stung by a right hand, and Jackson's right knee nearly touched the canvas. It was an indication of things to come.

Jackson, the Virgin Islands native who is 32 and had successfully defended his W.B.C. crown five times since 1990, was game. In the second round, he put a knot over McClellan's left eye and seemed to be restoring order. In the third round, though, an unintentional head butt by McClellan gashed Jackson's left eye. Though Jackson was unhurt, the cut was a nuisance.

By the fifth round, Jackson got his revenge — with a low blow to McClellan — but after Referee Mills Lane gave McClellan a full 30 seconds to catch his breath, the fight was never the same.

The 25-year-old McClellan now owns both the W.B.C. and World Boxing Organization titles and would command a fight against junior middleweight Terry Norris if he could keep his weight down.

Camacho broke the nose of Pittsburgh's Eric Podolak in a super-lightweight fight and delivered a fifth-round knockout, but his entrance into the ring was far more entrancing. He wore a furry mask over his face, a cape and tassled boxing shorts, and Podolak stared him down. Camacho (42-2, 19 knockouts) then bumped Podolak (19-4). Podolak took a swing and they nearly started Round 1 early.

De La Hoya Stops Foe

Oscar De La Hoya maintained his pace of a victory a month by stopping Frankie Avelar in the fourth round of a scheduled 10-round lightweight fight yesterday in Stateline, Nev. Avelar had never been down as a pro until being dropped in the second and third rounds. He went down again in the fourth, just seconds before the referee, Vic Drakulich, stopped the fight 2 minutes 3 seconds into the round. "My timing was right on the dot. I was using my combinations very well," De La Hoya said. "I was hitting him very hard and a few seconds later, he just fell." De La Hoya, 131 pounds, improved his record to 7-0 with six knockouts. Avelar, 131½, of Las Vegas, dropped to 15-3. Avelar, who fought for El Salvador in the 1988 Olympics, said he was unable to put pressure on De La Hoya, who has fought monthly since turning pro in November. (AP)

Stich vs. Chesnokov

Michael Stich and Andrei Chesnokov of Russia won semifinal matches yesterday in the German Open in Hamburg. Stich ended Emilio Sánchez's run of upsets, outlasting the Spaniard, 5-7, 7-6 (7-3), 7-6 (7-2). Chesnokov spoiled an all-German final when he beat Bernd Karbacher, 6-2, 6-4. Stich, the 1991 Wimbledon champion, overcame his own erratic play and finally converted his fifth match point against Sánchez. (AP)

Yzaga and Fromberg in Final: Defending champion Jaime Yzaga of Peru and Richard Fromberg of Australia won semifinal victories to advance to the title match of the $260,000 U.S.T.A. Men's Clay Courts in Tampa, Fla. Yzaga downed Patrick McEnroe, 7-6 (7-5), 6-3, while Fromberg defeated Bryan Shelton, 6-7 (5-7), 6-3, 7-5. Yzaga had a 5-2 lead in the tie breaker of the first set when McEnroe rallied to tie it. But McEnroe then became overanxious, netting a forehand return and spraying another forehand past the baseline. (AP)

Met Title to Rutgers

Rutgers's men's track team took the top five places in the pole vault to overcome an early Manhattan lead and win the team title in the Metropolitan Intercollegiate Track and Field Championships at St. John's yesterday. The Scarlet Knights scored 147 points to Manhattan's 131. Manhattan beat St. John's for the women's title, 195-179. Evan Clarke of New York Tech won the 100- and 200-meter dashes, and David Frazier of Manhattan won the long jump and triple jump.

3 Gold Medals for Senior: Jermaine Stafford made his trip from Rochester to White Plains for the Nestle-Loucks Games a worthwhile one yesterday, winning three gold medals. Stafford, a senior at Ben Franklin High School, easily won the 100-meter (10.81) and 200-meter (21.90) dashes and capped his efforts with a blazing anchor leg to give Franklin a 41.94 victory in the 400-meter relay. Stacey Minott almost matched Stafford's feats in the girls' events, The 15-year-old sophomore won the 100 in 12.10 and the 200 in a meet-record 24.46, and she gave New Rochelle the lead on the opening leg of the 400 relay. But the Hugenots failed to hold it and finished third.

aid's shorthanded goals. Although the Islanders are also missing their injured star, Pierre Turgeon, they start each game with the certainty that he won't be there, and they seem more sure of themselves than the defending champions. They have four shorthanded goals this series.

Tonight's show was really two games in one. It was scoreless for more than the first half of the evening, with another goaltender's duel looming between Pittsburgh's Tom Barrasso and New York's Glenn Healy.

But when Pittsburgh's Jaromir Jagr scored at 13 minutes 12 seconds of the second period, it triggered a flurry of red lights behind both netminders and launched the capacity crowd of 16,297 into a roaring wave that ebbed and flowed with the pace of play.

Every Other Minute

All 11 goals were scored in just under 20 minutes. King's game-winner came at 12:21 of the third period, when he took Ferraro's left-to-right pass across the slot and buried it behind Barrasso.

Troy Loney, Rick Tocchet, Kevin Stevens and Ron Francis got the other goals for Pittsburgh.

Of all 11 scored tonight, Malakhov's was the one for the highlight reel. With the scored tied at 4-4 in the 10th minute of the third period, Malakhov cut over the blue line, took a long bounce pass from Brian Mullen, cut around Ulf Samuelsson on the defense and brought Barrasso down with a series of fakes before putting it past him.

King had six shots on goal and Malakhov had five.

Fitzgerald's two goals came while he killed a penalty against Claude Loiselle for high-sticking. The penalty should have gone to Fitzgerald, but Referee Don Koharski sent the wrong man to the box. Because Fitzgerald is a regular penalty-killer, no Islander complained.

The Islanders scored four shorthanded goals on Pittsburgh during the regular season. Fitzgerald said thew Penguins take deep chances on the power play, exposing them to counter-rushes.

"If you want to dance, you have to pay the fiddler," Fitzgerald said. Of the Islanders' overall situation, Fitzgerald added: "There's no pressure on us. All the pressure's on them. We're the underdogs. We'll keep playing that role."

King, with a variation on the "monkey-off-the-back" cliché, said he is now rid of "a huge ape."

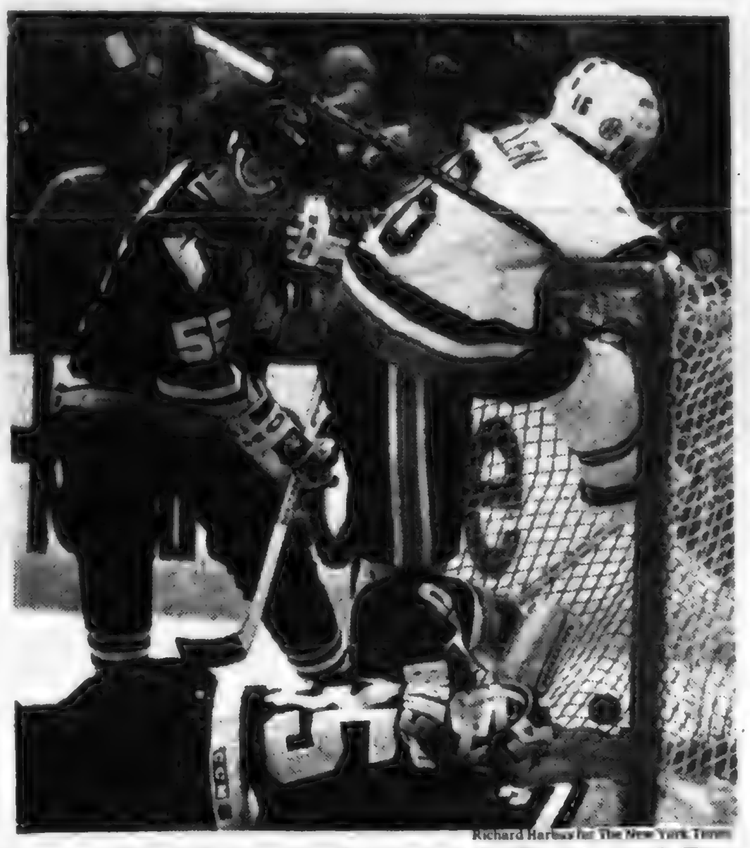
"I guess I couldn't pick a better time to do it," he said. "This is another chapter in the Islanders' book. It's about time I scored. Maybe I can relax now."

Ferraro couldn't keep the grin off his face in the post-game locker room.

"With a 3-1 lead and 19 minutes left, we looked pretty good," Ferraro said. "I didn't know we'd need a field goal to win."

Lemieux a Shadow

Lemieux had played one shift in the first game, none in the second and many at reduced efficiency in the third. In this game, he took one shift in each of the first two periods, both on power plays, and was ineffective until setting up Stevens in the third. He played in the final minute, after the Penguins pulled Barrasso for an extra attacker.



Richard Harbus for The New York Times

Islanders' Brian Mullen crashing into the net after Penguins goalie Tom Barrasso deflected the puck in the first period. Larry Murphy defended.

Jagr started the scoring by stealing the puck from Brad Dalgarno and beating Healy with a low shot to the glove side after a series of fakes.

Curiously, this seemed to ignite the Islanders, who got their second power-play goal of the series, by Ferraro, at 15:44.

Ferraro, an early candidate for the Conn Smythe Trophy as best player in the playoffs, took King's pass low in the right corner and fed a shot toward the crease. The puck hit either a Pittsburgh stick and Barrasso's body or both and found its way over the goal line. As the light went on and King congratulated him, Ferraro shrugged as if to say, "When you're hot, you're hot." King, at this point, was not.

The Islanders took the lead with 17 seconds left in the second period on a shorthanded goal, their third of the series. With Lemieux on the ice but hardly involved, the Islanders stormed down the ice and held possession for two good chances. On the second, Fitzgerald fired a slapshot from the deep slot that beat Barrasso high on the glove side, apparently after hitting a Pittsburgh stick en route.

At this point of the series, the Penguins were without a goal on the power play, which has been among the best in the league for the last three seasons and has helped them to Stanley Cup championships in the last two springs.

The Pittsburgh power play carried over to the beginning of the third period and the Islanders again took advantage, with Fitzgerald scoring another shorthanded goal to give New York a 3-1 lead at the 25-second mark.

After Darius Kasparaitis cleared the puck with a diving lunge, Fitzgerald raced down ice on a two-on-one break with Benoit Hogue on his left. Using Hogue as a decoy, Fitzgerald rifled a slap shot from the top of the right-wing circle to trigger another explosion of sound.

The crowd quieted down quickly when Loney cut the lead to 3-2 by scoring from behind Healy when his centering pass bounced in off an Islander skate at 2:32. Tocchet made it 3-3 at 2:53 when he stood uncovered on the lip of Healy's crease and waited for the puck to find its way through many skates.

The Islanders got it back within a minute, at 3:31, when King got his first of the post-season, banging in a big rebound after Dennis Vaske's shot. But Pittsburgh tied it at 4-4 at 6:24 when Lemeiux, working behind the New York net on a power play, set up Stevens in the slot. It was Stevens's first goal of the series and Pittsburgh's first power-play goal.

Canadiens Complete a Sweep

BUFFALO, May 8 (AP) — Kirk Muller's slapshot goal 11 minutes 37 seconds into the extra period gave the Montreal Canadiens their third straight 4-3 overtime victory over the Buffalo Sabres tonight and a sweep of their Adams Division final.

Lemieux Playing in Fear and Out of Step

By ROBIN FINN
Special to The New York Times

UNIONDALE, L.I. May 8 — He has become the specter of this series to determine the Patrick Division champion — a tall, brooding and irritable figure, ramrod stiff on his skates, who arrives and departs with a ghostly menace. As usual, he is a solitary man in a sport devoted to team play, but this time the reason for his separation from the masses is not his superior talent but a nagging, stabbing pain in his lower back that has rendered him barely locomotive.

Mario Lemieux said his back hurt him all day today, but nonetheless, when it came time for the Penguins to try to take a commanding three-games-to-one series lead back home to Pittsburgh, Lemieux wore a jersey and a grimace into the lineup. And with goalie Tom Barrasso yanked in the final 96 seconds in favor of a sixth, albeit ailing, attacker, there was Lemieux, frantically trying to force overtime with shots launched with 35, and later just 7 seconds to go.

But at the end of a long game that began on so defensive a note that nobody scored in the first period, and ended so raucously that eight goals were produced in the third, all Lemieux took home with a 6-5 loss and a deadlocked series was a solitary assist.

After not scoring, and after playing peacemaker in the spurt of center ice unpleasantries that followed the final buzzer, Lemieux chose not to pass personal judgment on the game or his contribution to it.

"His back was sore," was the blanket explanation given by Penguins Coach Scotty Bowman. "He couldn't play regularly, and we naturally play different when Mario's not playing regularly. We're not able to blow teams out."

Lemieux skipped the morning skate, showed up late for the evening warmup and barely touched the puck as he skated his preliminary circles. Instead of twirling it like a lariat, he nudged it along with his stick blade much like a child carrying an egg on a spoon. But this was a child who moved with an old man's infirmity, with an ache in every syllable of body language.

Lemieux did not feel spry enough to volunteer to take a regular shift. He decided it was safest that the Penguins subpoena him only for power-play duty. And once the Islanders got wind of that strategy, they went to great lengths to execute a tactic of their own: they stayed out of the penalty box in order to make Lemieux stay out of the game.

So for most of the night there he sat, hunkered on the bench while the full-timers panted on either side of him. Like a scarecrow in a field, Lemieux held down his post, and the Islanders did nothing to draw him from it. But when they finally did, with Ray Ferraro's first-period holding penalty at 10:38, Lemieux performed like a straw man, almost too stiff to maneuver and surely too stiff to work any magic.

The Penguin power play reached 0 for 13 in this series after its first and only first-period exercise.

In the second, with the clubs locked in a 1-1 tie, Lemieux had to wait until 18:33 to lead his power play back onto the ice, and this time it foundered. At 19:49, Tom Fitzgerald put the shorthanded Islanders ahead 2-1 with his first-ever playoff goal. And then, as the third period convened with the Penguins still on the power play, Lemieux, the not-so-scary specter, had to endure yet another frightening experience: Fitzgerald scored shorthanded again and put the Islanders ahead by 3-1.

Finally, a Contribution

But when granted a second power-play shift in the third period, Lemieux made his presence felt. He stung Glenn Healy with a shot and then provided the pivotal assist on the Kevin Stevens goal that briefly reknotted matters at 4-4.

Did Lemieux, who is surgery-bound after these playoffs, play in fear along with the pain? He said he did, and that he was nearly petrified each time he accelerated, afraid that his back would go out. But stronger than his worries about his sore back were his fears that the Islanders, as scrappy a crew as he and his fellow two-time Stanley Cup champions have encountered in any hockey nightmare, might put the Penguins out of the playoffs.

That's why Lemieux, who hardly played at all, played at all.

Sabatini To Play Martínez In Final

By KEN SHULMAN
Special to The New York Times

ROME, May 8 — Gabriela Sabatini combined patience and power here today to defeat top-seeded Arantxa Sánchez Vicario, 6-1, 6-3, in the semifinals of the Italian Open.

The Sabatini victory ended Sánchez Vicario's winning streak at 18 matches, and gave the Argentine star a chance to win her third consecutive Rome title. On Sunday, Sabatini will play sixth-seeded Conchita Martínez of Spain, who beat fourth-seeded Mary Joe Fernandez, 7-5, 6-4.

"I decided to play my game today and not to let her get into the match," said the 22-year-old Sabatini, who has yet to win a tournament in 1993. "I was sick at the beginning of the year, and I haven't been 100 percent physically or mentally. Now I'm starting to feel better. And today I played my best match of the year."

The third-seeded Sabatini, who is No. 5 in the Women's Tennis Association ranking, held a 10-4 advantage in matches with Sánchez Vicario coming into the semifinal today. But Sánchez Vicario, ranked third, had triumphed in their last four meetings, including a three-set victory at Amelia Island in April.

Sánchez Vicario, who arrived in Rome as a last-minute entry, was on an impressive tear, having reached the finals of her six previous tournaments, and having won four of them.

'Too Many Mistakes'

"Gabriela was more consistent than I was today," said the 21-year-old Spaniard. "And I made a few too many mistakes. Still, I'm not disappointed at all. Nobody can take away what I've done so far this year. And I'll try to do better next week."

On Friday, Sabatini put an end to another streak when she defeated the 16-year-old Italian qualifier Francesca Bentivoglio, 6-1, 6-1. Bentivoglio had upset seventh-seeded Jana Novotna and No. 15 Natalia Zvereva on her way to the quarterfinals, momentarily replacing Sabatini as the darling of the Rome crowd.

In the day's first semifinal, the 21-year-old Martínez used her powerful topspin groundstrokes to back her opponent off the baseline. On the few occasions when Fernandez was able to rush net, the Spaniard passed her cleanly with sharply angled, dipping drives.

"Conchita played very well today," said Fernandez, who is ranked sixth in the world. "She moved me around, and she didn't give me many opportunities to come to net."

Martínez, who has 16 career singles titles to her credit, defeated second-seeded Martina Navratilova, 6-1, 6-4, in their Friday night quarterfinal.

MATCH POINTS

Although only a little over a week has passed since the stabbing of MONICA SELES at the Citizen Cup tournament in Hamburg, Germany, the echoes of the attack are already fading on the tour. "Certainly the players are aware of what happened to Monica," said Women's Tennis Association Rome tour director GEORGINA CLARK on Friday. "But today, anyone who walks down the street has to keep his eyes open. The important thing is to make the players feel secure here without turning this place into a fortress." For Rome tournament director FRANCO BARTONI, the incident in Hamburg meant only minimal changes and revisions in the Italian Open's existing security system. "There was a small increase in the requests for escorts and bodyguards," Bartoni said.

Borg Receives a Lesson From His Elders

By ROBERT McG. THOMAS Jr.

Experience counts and so does skill, but when it comes to old-guy tennis, youth must be served — and often as not, 36-year-old Bjorn Borg will answer with a crackling return too hot to handle.

That more, or less, was the story of the Manhattan Masters through the first three rounds of the six-team doubles round robin as Borg and his 46-year-old partner, Ilie Nastase, swept to a 3-0 record against far older opponents at the 69th Regiment Armory on Lexington Avenue at 26th Street.

It was also the story through the first set of yesterday's fourth-round match against Tony Roche, 47, and Manuel Santana, 54. With Borg and Nastase both contributing sizzling aces as well as stinging returns and well-placed put-aways, the pair swept through the 6-0 set in 19 minutes.

Then they relaxed, which was only their first mistake.

A Trio of Aces

Ten often sloppy games and one 12-point match tie breaker later, Roche and Santana had conquered the whippersnappers, 0-6, 6-4, plus the 7-5 tie-breaker game, which, in concession to the players' advanced ages, is used after split sets in place of a deciding third set.

In the second set, it was Santana, the Spaniard who won four Grand Slam events in the 1960's, who was the master of the unmasterable serve and sting, ripping off three aces against Nastase, including two in one love game, and slamming home one winner after another.

Borg and Nastase, who had previously beaten Ken Rosewall and Marty Riessen, Rod Laver and Bob Lutz and Roy Emerson and Roscoe Tanner, entered today's final round with a 3-1 record. That puts them even with Laver, 54, and Lutz, 45, who won yesterday's opening match, against Frew McMillan, 50, and Bob Hewitt, 53.

Borg and Nastase aside, there was further evidence that age is far from the determining factor when former champions play.

Until Borg and Nastase took on Santana and Roche in the day's final match, the 58-year-old Rosewall, the oldest player in the tournament, had been the clear class of the court yesterday as he and Riessen beat Emerson, 56, and Tanner by 7-6, 6-0.

They won in part because Tanner, 41, the tournament's second-youngest player, had a distinctly off day at the service line.

To the dissappointment of the 500 fans, who wanted to see a serve they couldn't see, Tanner didn't have an ace all day. He missed many of his steaming first serves altogether and those he didn't miss were invariably returned.

After scoring what he described as "tons of aces" earlier in the week, Tanner, who said his serve had recently been timed at 135 miles an hour (down a bit from the 153 at his prime) said the problem yesterday wasn't its speed but his opponents' skill in anticipating it.

For all Tanner's problems, the victory was mainly a tribute to Rosewall's sure, steady play and his patented backhand slices.

Their loss gave Emerson and Tanner an 0-4 record going into today's opening match, against Roche and Santana (2-2) at noon. That will be followed by Borg and Nastase (3-1) against Hewitt and McMillan (2-2), and Rosewall and Riessen (2-2) against Laver and Lutz (3-1.)

Golf Balls, Batteries And Bitter Insults

IT will be like this at the Garden again today — hot and bright and noisy and emotional. The Knicks are going to run into young legs, and there will also be an element of meanness loose in the Garden, and I am not referring to Patrick and Alonzo. They are paid to be mean. I am talking about the rest of us.

Last Sunday in the Garden, a fan in the very expensive seats was screaming at the refs on every play. "Hey, give us a break! Hey, you're killing us! Hey, that wasn't your call!" He was impassioned. He was loud. And he had a child on his lap.

The message to the child was clear. This basketball team, these Knicks, are so, so important that they make it worth it to scream at referees. We see this a lot in the Garden. There used to be a guy who pounded the glass at hockey games, yelling "Get a Porsche!" at the Flyers' goalies, a reference to the car accident that killed Philadelphia goalie Pelle Lindbergh.

Then there was the man out at the Nassau Coliseum years ago, the one spewing racial insults at Grant Fuhr. I asked that fan why he was yelling those hideous things at the opposition goalie, and his face became even more distended, and he screamed, "Because I want to help my team!"

"My team." In a world where Serbs kill Croats and Croats kill Serbs because they have hated each other for centuries, it is not so surprising that we have made an institution of sports rivalries, the good guys versus the bad guys.

That's why I have a problem with boxing, with paying desperate men to beat each other up for our enjoyment, not that far from subsidizing a snuff movie. Football isn't all that much better, not when broadcasters chortle if somebody gets his "bell rung."

And then we have Mr. Dale Hunter of the Washington Capitals, who mugged Pierre Turgeon in public recently, and the new commissioner of hockey gave him a quarter of the season off, without pay. This may sound cynical, but if an Islander had done it, some of the home fans would have cheered.

In sports, it's us-versus-them, and it's getting worse. On sports-talk radio, everybody is a chump or a loser. A couple of city firefighters found a lost playbook, and instead of returning it to Malik Sealy of the Pacers, they bartered it to Imus for some tickets and some yuks, and surely to their surprise, some money for charity. Apparently, all's fair in love and war and sports. Meanwhile, the writers are turning into pit bulls. The message is out. Kicking butt pays.

Which brings me to Monica Seles, with a half-inch slice in her back. The man suddenly materialized out of the crowd, carrying a knife, and there was nobody to stop him. Thank goodness she survived. If she had enrolled in college tomorrow, under an assumed name, I would have understood. Instead, she says she's coming back, because she's Monica Seles, one of the great sporting warriors of our time.

The man is said to be a German who roots for the innocent Steffi Graf. He is probably off balance, but by how much? How far a leap is it from shouting insults at goalies to bearing weapons?

The tennis tour moved on to Rome, where fans are known to fling 100-lira coins the size of manhole covers at the heads of players who displease them. There could be no magic plastic bubble around the players in Rome because, as one Italian official said, "A nut can deface the 'Mona Lisa,' but if you want to appreciate it, you can't hide it behind a screen."

There are lovely corners of the tour where the average fan can literally stand next to the greatest players in the world. Tennis has always been a sport of self-restraint, in which you do not cheer double faults, but the big bucks are changing that. Jimmy Connors psychologically mugged a chair official and Aaron Krickstein on Labor Day two years ago. It's all breaking down.

Athletes know there are semi-assassins out there in the crowds. Bottles used to come flying out of the stands, but these days batteries and golf balls are the weapons of choice for sneaks.

It's the price of fame. A nonentity walked up to John Lennon one night outside the Dakota and made sure there would never be any more lyrics like, "The way things are going, they're going to crucify me." I'm still not convinced Lee Harvey Oswald didn't kill John Kennedy by himself because he was a pathetic little man.

Women have reason to feel they are targets for men under many conditions. Fame only magnifies the blend of power and sex and vulnerability. A soap-opera actress was killed because she stirred an admirer. Performers get calls on the house phone of their hotel: "I know what room you're in."

Female tennis players are stalked by weirdos. Michael Mewshaw, the author of "Ladies of the Court: Grace and Disgrace on the Women's Tennis Tour," published by Crown, told me about a man who screamed obscenities at two top female players on the pathway of a tournament. These two stars turned and ran, but the next week Mewshaw saw the same man at another tournament. In another country.

There is only so much you can do for public figures on stage, walking through kitchens after a primary, standing on motel balconies, playing on center court. At campaign speeches and basketball games and rock concerts, I see hard-eyed guards standing with their backs to the performers, looking for that one face in the crowd. It is the least we can do.

But there is something else we all can do. Every time we start playing us-versus-them, we can ask how far we should go. Do we cheer double faults? Do we heckle the goalie? Do we scream at the refs with a child on our lap? Do journalists and broadcasters call everybody a bozo? Are we touching off something dangerous in the stranger next to us?

Lofton and Raiders Reportedly Have a Deal

Receiver JAMES LOFTON, who played two years for the Los Angeles Raiders before going to the Buffalo Bills four years ago, has reportedly agreed to a two-year deal with the Raiders for $1.8 million. The Los Angeles Times reported yesterday that an announcement is expected tomorrow.

Lofton, 36, had 51 receptions for 786 yards and 6 touchdowns for Buffalo last season.

In another development, the Raiders traded the veteran wide receiver MERVYN FERNANDEZ to the San Francisco 49ers for an undisclosed 1994 draft choice. Fernandez, 33, caught 207 passes for 3,764 yards and 19 touchdowns in his six-year stint with the Raiders. (AP)

Restic Will Retire

JOE RESTIC, Harvard's coach for 22 years, will retire after the 1993 season when his current five-year contract expires, according to The Boston Globe. The Crimson's overall record under Restic is 114-90-6; it was 3-7 last season.

Forget to Miss Open

GUY FORGET, France's top hope, probably will miss the French Open this month because of an injury in his right knee.

"There is very little chance Guy will play," trainer PATRICE HAGELAUER said Friday. "Wisdom requires that he stop, rest, heal and try to regain an iron health."

After losing to 235th-ranked DIRK DIER of Germany in the German Open this week, Forget complained that knee problems were limiting him to "only 60 percent of my ability." (AP)

Aikens Out on Bond

Former Kansas City Royals first-baseman WILLIE AIKENS, one of the players involved in the team's drug scandal of a decade ago, has been charged with possessing a small amount of cocaine. Aikens was released on bond Friday after turning himself in at the Johnson County courthouse in Olathe, Kan., a Kansas City suburb. His first court appearance is scheduled for next week. Aikens's attorney, DENNIS MOORE, said he would contest the charges.

Police in Lenexa, Kan., also a Kansas City suburb, said they found cocaine in Aikens's possession during a routine traffic stop in February. Aikens was charged with one count of cocaine possession and one count of possessing drug paraphernalia. Police said Aikens was a passenger in a car that he owns. While with the Royals in 1983, Aikens pleaded guilty to attempting to obtain cocaine. A federal judge sentenced him to three months in prison. (AP)

Bream's Grand Slam Caps Braves' Surge

By The Associated Press

Braves 8, Rockies 7

Atlanta Manager Bobby Cox put it succinctly: "A lead is never safe in this place."

He got no arguments, particularly from the Colorado Rockies, who blew a 6-0 lead in the eighth inning in losing to the Braves, 8-7, yesterday in Mile High Stadium.

Sid Bream's pinch-hit grand slam highlighted a six-run eighth inning that drew the Braves into a tie, and Jeff Blauser and David Justice had run-scoring singles in the ninth as Atlanta won its third straight game — all in Denver — and handed the Rockies their fourth straight loss.

"You can't ever give up in this ball park," Cox said of hitter-friendly Mile High Stadium. "The infield is really fast, and there's really a short porch in left field. There's just nothing safe here, absolutely nothing."

Bream is a believer, too. With the Braves trailing by 6-2 and the bases loaded, he was facing a full count and was doing little more than protecting the plate. His opposite-field homer off reliever Willie Blair just cleared the 333-foot sign down the left-field line.

"I was trying to make contact, do whatever I could to hit the ball," he said. "In any other ball park, that's a sacrifice fly and I get a run in.

Jerald Clark and Charlie Hayes hit home runs to give the Rockies and Bruce Ruffin a 6-0 lead through seven innings.

But Colorado's shoddy defense and shaky bullpen combined to blow the lead in the eighth, when the Braves scored six runs on only three hits. Three errors helped cut the deficit to 6-2, setting up Bream's tying homer.

Atlanta won the game in the ninth when Otis Nixon led off with a walk, went to second on a wild pitch by Scott Fredrickson (0-1) and scored on Blauser's single. Blauser took second on the throw to the plate and scored on Justice's single off Gary Wayne.

Kent Mercker (2-0), who pitched the eighth, got the victory and Mike Stanton earned his 11th save.

Rockies Manager Don Baylor was so frustrated by the loss that he declined to talk with reporters, leaving the clubhouse early. But no one felt the frustration more than Ruffin, who had shut out the Braves on three hits through seven innings, then watched from the bench as the shutout, the victory and the lead disappeared.

Ruffin, who had worked out of difficulty in the second, fourth and sixth innings, tired in the eighth. With one out, he allowed two base runners and, after throwing 131 pitches, gave way to Blair.

The Braves loaded the bases when shortstop Vinny Castilla booted what could have been an inning-ending, double-play grounder. Ron Gant then popped up to shallow right field and second baseman Eric Young dropped an attempted over-the-shoulder catch, then threw wild to third, allowing two runs to score. Then, after a walk, Bream hit his third career grand slam.

Colorado gave Ruffin the lead in the first inning on Clark's two-run homer off Pete Smith.

The Rockies scored four more runs in the seventh. Hayes greeted Smith with a 406-foot shot to left, his club-leading seventh homer of the year. After a single and a hit-batsman, Young made it 4-0 with a sacrifice fly and, with the bases loaded, Andres Galarraga hit a two-run single off reliever Steve Bedrosian.

Cubs 8, Padres 6

Two passed balls by Dan Walters on consecutive pitches resulted in two runs in the seventh inning as the Cubs rallied to beat San Diego at Wrigley Field.

Trailing by 5-4, the Cubs loaded the bases with none out off Pat Gomez (0-2) on pinch singles by Rey Sanchez and Willie Wilson and Jose Vizcaino's bunt single. After Mark Grace's sacrifice fly tied the score, Ryne Sandberg was intentionally walked to reload the bases.

With Derrick May batting, Walters made his two passed balls, allowing Wilson and Vizcaino to score. May added an r.b.i. single for the fourth run of the inning.

Chuck McElroy (2-1) pitched one inning for the victory and Randy Myers worked one inning for his ninth save, allowing a run on a wild pitch.

Kurt Stillwell's r.b.i. single in the sixth gave San Diego a 5-4 lead against starter Mike Harkey.

Sammy Sosa's seventh homer off starter Dave Eiland in the fourth inning gave the Cubs a 4-2 lead. But Tony Gwynn's two-run double tied the score in the fifth.

Gary Sheffield hit a two-run homer in the first inning for San Diego, his seventh.

Astros 12, Reds 1

Jeff Bagwell hit a three-run homer, his sixth homer in his last seven home games, to highlight a 15-hit Houston attack as the Astros routed Cincinnati at the Astrodome. The loss dropped John Smiley to 0-5.

Darryl Kile (2-0) was the winner, going six innings and allowing one run on four hits.

Smiley, signed as a free agent, gave up seven earned runs on eight hits in three innings. He now has a 7.08 e.r.a.

Houston scored five runs in the first inning. Craig Biggio started things with a double and after a walk to Luis Gonzalez, Bagwell hit his seventh home run of the season. Chris James capped the inning with a two-run homer.

Houston made it 6-0 in the second on an RBI single by Eric Anthony, and the Astros added a run in the sixth when Scott Servais hit his second home run of the season.

Late Thunder Saves Yanks From Tigers

By JACK CURRY
Special to The New York Times

Yankees	10
Tigers	8

DETROIT, May 8 — The Yankees must feel as if they are playing in baseball's version of the Twilight Zone. No lead is safe at Tiger Stadium. The Yankees have charged to 6-0 leads in the first two games of the series, but the Tigers stormed back each time to regain the lead.

There are even more reasons for the Yankees to feel that the ghost of Rod Serling is lingering somewhere. Reliever Steve Howe tripped running down the clubhouse stairs near the dugout before the game, sprained his ankle and is expected to be placed on the 15-day disabled list Sunday. Jim Abbott came back to his home state was given a lead and lasted only three innings.

But the strangeness turned in the Yankees' favor in the 11th inning when pinch-hitter Matt Nokes lashed a two-run homer off Dave Johnson to carry the Yanks to a 10-8 victory over the Tigers. It was Nokes's first pinch-hit of the year, only his second homer of the year and it came against a team that could not wait to trade him to the Yankees in 1990. Definitely another eerie twist there.

With Steve Farr pitching the 10th, Manager Buck Showalter had only one reliever left so the Yankees would have been in a ticklish situation if the game had advanced much further. But Farr allowed only one single in two innings to notch the victory and keep the Yankees one and a half games behind the Tigers. Farr has five saves and a triumph in his six outings and has added some luster to the struggling bullpen.

"It was a good win," Showalter said. "That's the way it turned out. We've come back from a lot of tough losses this year."

Tiger Bullpen Wilts

Just when it seemed the Yankees might lose their fourth game in a row, it was the Tiger bullpen that wilted. Danny Tartabull, who had ended his career-worst 0 for 23 streak with a run-scoring single in the first, blasted a homer off Mike Henneman to tie the score at 8-8 and send it to extra innings. But the Yankees did not have their magic extend to the 10th. After they put runners on first and third with one out off Henneman, Pat Kelly struck out and Don Mattingly popped out to shortstop.

Scott Kamieniecki was put in a tough spot when he replaced Abbott with the Yankees leading, 7-5, in the fourth inning, the bases loaded, no outs and Cecil Fielder batting. Daunting? Just a bit. Fielder had a sacrifice fly and Rob Deer singled to tie the score.

The No. 9 batter, Skeeter Barnes, smoked a bases-empty homer into the left-field seats off Kamieniecki in the fifth to give the Tigers their first lead at 8-7.

Howe was perturbed because he sprained his ankle in a freakish accident. After tripping on a flight of stairs leading to the dugout runway, Howe tried stretching with his teammates before the pain forced him back into the trainer's room. X-rays were negative, but Howe is expected to miss at least one to two weeks.

Another 6-0 Lead Lost

One night after the Yankees squandered a 6-0 lead and lost, 7-6, to Detroit, their advantage was challenged even earlier tonight. The Tigers rallied in the seventh, eighth and 12th Friday. Tonight, they rushed back in the first five innings to snatch an 8-7 lead. After Tom Bolton lasted a mere five hitters, Detroit's bullpen tamed the Yankees on two runs over eight innings until Tartabull homered leading off the ninth.

Maybe Abbott wasn't used to pitching with such an impressive lead because he failed to squelch the Tigers as he walked six and allowed seven runs in three innings to inflate his earned run average from 3.53 to 4.66. Detroit scored one in the first, Alan Trammell crushed a three-run homer in the second and three walks and a groundout in the third closed the gap to 6-5. Abbott left in the fourth.

Abbott, who was supported with a mere 13 runs in his first six starts, was provided with more offense in the first inning than he had received in any of his starts. The first four Yankees singled off Bolton and Jim Leyritz added a double to the center-field warning track to bounce the left-hander from the game with a 3-0 deficit.

Three more runs crossed in the inning on Spike Owen's run-scoring single and Mike Gallego's slow roller to third base. Velarde and Leyritz scored on Gallego's grounder as Velarde hustled home from second when first baseman Mickey Tettleton hesitated with the ball. And the Yankees led, 6-0.

Baseball To Break With TV Tradition

A network official said baseball's proportion of the cash generated from advertising sold by the venture's sales company would be revealed in several days. A person in baseball familiar with the plan said the owners' share would eventually be 80 percent but would be even higher, perhaps 90 percent, initially.

The risks inherent in the deal for baseball and the two networks were hinted at yesterday by Neal Pilson, the president of CBS Sports, which will stop broadcasting baseball after four years.

"It's a very large amount of advertising that would be sold by a separate unit that would compete with the inventory the network has to sell for other events," Pilson said. CBS has posted losses on its current $1.06 billion agreement believed to be equal to half the value of the contract.

The working capital for the joint venture will be provided equally by the networks and major league baseball. The venture will be overseen by a nine-person board of directors, with five coming from baseball and two from each of the networks.

Given the slowness of baseball to move on other fronts, such as naming a new commissioner and establishing a stronger marketing presence, a rejection by owners of the television plan, which was put together quickly, would be extremely embarrassing.

Union in the Dark

"This is the wave of the future," said Bud Selig, the Milwaukee Brewers' owner and the interim commissioner of baseball. "We believe we have control over our destiny in this partnership. Baseball's been criticized for being slow to react and this shows us to be proactive."

Yet the deal was not immediately lauded by the players' union. Donald Fehr, executive director of the Major League Baseball Players Association, said he had not been told in advance about the plan, which seems to be at odds with baseball's expressed desire to be partners with the union.

"You'd think they'd let their partners know what they're doing," Fehr said. "But apparently they want to be partners with the networks and not the players. I hope they do well together."

If the full ownership approves the plan, it will pose great financial risk for baseball at a time when the game's cost structure is unsettled by soaring salaries. But network and baseball executives expressed hope that they could make it profitable.

"Last year, CBS had $151 million net sales attributable to baseball," said Dick Ebersol, the president of NBC Sports. "We feel strongly that we will clearly exceed that total."

Added Tom Werner, an owner of the San Diego Padres, who headed the television committee: "In the short run, we're no worse than if we made a standard rights deal, but we don't expect to immediately get what we're getting from CBS."

How the Plan Works

From the details discussed yesterday, ABC and NBC will divvy up the season this way:

¶The networks will use local team productions and announcers and will split the country into at least four regions, with games going to the areas of greatest geographic interest. ABC and NBC would use their own announcers, like Bob Costas and Al Michaels, for two of the regional games.

¶The ABC-NBC rotation for the All-Star Game and the post-season will find the All-Star Game and league championship series going to one network for one year and the proposed new round of wild-card playoffs and the World Series going to the other.

¶All games of the wild-card playoffs — three-of-five series in which each league's East Division winner would play the second-place team in the West Division, with the second-place East team playing the West winner — would be played simultaneously and aired regionally.

¶All L.C.S. games will air simultaneously and be shown regionally, except for Games 6 and 7, which will have staggered starts.

¶World Series games on the weekend — Games 1, 2, 6 and 7 — will start no later than 7:20 P.M. Eastern time, more than an hour earlier than they have started for several seasons.

The extra round of playoffs needs approval of ownership and the Major League Baseball Players Associaton.

They are designed to stoke fan interest toward the end of the year. "We have done extensive research that says 70 percent of the fans would like to see divisional playoffs, and we think this is part of regenerating fan interest," said Werner.

In the negotiations, which culminated Friday night, baseball and the networks were determined to reverse a seven-year year decline in regular-season TV ratings that was highlighted by CBS's 3.4 last year and a 3.1 this season.

'Sleeping Dogs' Bark at Buck

Special to The New York Times

DETROIT, May 8 — Sparky against Buck? Bad blood brewing? There was Friday, but both managers tried to squelch it tonight.

In the sixth inning Friday, with the Yankees leading, 6-0, Pat Kelly, the runner on first, sprinted for second base. Sparky Anderson, the Tigers' manager, was outraged. Television cameras caught him screaming at Yankees Manager Buck Showalter.

Anderson continued today by claiming that running with a six-run lead is not proper etiquette. He quoted Branch Rickey by saying a team should never wake a sleeping dog. Showalter then happened to telephone Anderson to discuss the situation, and the Tiger manager quickly softened his stance. Even at the expense of the truth.

First, Anderson said he was mad at himself and not at anything the Yankees did. Next, he denied that he had ever spoken with Showalter. Finally, Anderson insisted that he never criticized Showalter by name and that "some people" might question that sort of strategy.

"Branch Rickey said you should always let a dog sleep," Anderson said. "Blame it on him. I didn't use anyone's name."

Showalter, who was privately perturbed that Anderson would question anyone pushing for more offense when the Tigers lead the majors in runs and play in a hitter's ballpark, said: "I had the guts to confront the situation and not cower in the corner and let it slide. I'm sure Sparky knows I wanted that seventh run."

The Yankees could have used it. They lost, 7-6.

Mets Emerge as Own Worst Opponent

happen. Me and Cubby had some words. It's between me and Cubby. That's it. End of story."

When asked if frustration contributed to his reaction, Bonilla glared at a reporter and repeated "end of story."

Bonilla first exploded in the infield, according to Cubbage, launching into a tirade that the coach termed "not repeatable." Cubbage said that after playing out the top of the ninth inning in right field, Bonilla reignited the argument in the Mets' dugout.

"He started shouting at me and I shouted back," Cubbage said of the confrontration on the field. "We went on in. I thought that would be it, but it wasn't. In the dugout he came right down at me. I didn't want a confrontation. He came right at me, so I had my say, too."

Miffed a Bit

Cubbage said after the game that he planned to meet with Bonilla sometime in the near future to settle the matter. He appeared to still be somewhat miffed by the outfielder's behavior.

Bonilla's failure on the bases leads to a confrontation with Cubbage.

"I don't have to tell him anything," Cubbage said. "On a two-out fly ball, I expect him to be to third base by the time it's caught. He stopped halfway to second base and started watching it. It's my responsibility to see that he does what he's supposed to on the bases, and he took offense to what I said."

In July 1991, Vince Coleman screamed obscenities at Cubbage during batting practice in San Diego. The incident drew a lot of attention, but in the days that followed Manager Bud Harrleson declined to ask Coleman to apologize or to arrange a meeting between Cubbage and Coleman. His failure to quickly address the situation is widely considered to be one of the factors leading to his firing later that season.

Yesterday, Mets Manager Jeff Torborg acknowledged that Bonilla "wasn't busting it around second base," but he insisted that "everything is all right" between Cubbage and Bonilla. Torborg tried to make light of the incident — he joked that the two were going to "go fight it out in the parking lot" — but he knows that the short tempers were simply a sign of the current sad state of his club.

"Frustration has set in in all areas," Torborg acknowledged.

The loss to the Marlins certainly marked a new low for this season's Mets, who now can do no better than tie Florida for sixth place in the division before the Marlins leave town Monday night.

New York trailed, 3-0, after the top of the fourth inning, Schourek already having given up seven hits. With a bases-empty home run from Eddie Murray and another run walked in by Marlins starter Jack Armstrong in the fifth, the Mets flirted briefly with a one-run deficit. But reliever Jeff Innis gave up three straight hits for another Florida run in the sixth, and the Mets did nothing but strand base runners the rest of the game.

"Four hits, and one was an infield bunt from Todd," Torborg said, referring to Todd Hundley, his catcher. "You don't know what to say about it."

Say it was ugly, and frustrating, and not at all what the Mets need to see from their offense in their current sad state. How important is this series to New York? After the Mets defeated the Marlins, 4-0, behind Doc Gooden on Friday night, Howard Johnson had this to say:

"We can't lose to these guys."

INSIDE PITCH

JEFF KENT was beaned by a JACK ARMSTRONG pitch in the fifth inning and did not return to the game. He was examined by a doctor and determined to have no medical problems. "It's nothing serious," said Kent, who admitted that his ears were ringing immediately afterward. ... Marlins catcher BENITO SANTIAGO was benched and fined for arriving late to the ball park. Santiago said he overslept because his wake-up call rang in the other room of his two-room hotel suite.

McDowell Wins His 6th and Bo Helps With a Homer

By The Associated Press

White Sox 10, Indians 7

Bo Jackson snapped a tie with a bases-empty home run in the fifth inning, and Chicago went on to beat Cleveland, 10-7, last night at Comiskey Park.

Jack McDowell (6-1, 5.25 earned run average) became the first six-game winner in the majors. In six innings, he gave up 7 runs on 8 hits. Roberto Hernandez, Chicago's fourth pitcher, worked the ninth for his sixth save.

George Bell hit a homer and drove in four runs to help the White Sox win their third straight game and ninth in their last 11. Frank Thomas and Ellis Burks also homered for Chicago.

Football Award For Schwarzkopf

By The Associated Press

General Norman Schwarzkopf is the recipient of the National Football Foundation's Gold Medal award for this year.

The now retired general, commander of Operation Desert Storm, will receive the gold medal at the foundation's awards dinner Dec. 7 in New York when the College Football Hall of Fame inducts its new members.

Previous winners included seven United States presidents: Hoover, Eisenhower, Kennedy, Nixon, Ford, Reagan and Bush.

AMERICAN LEAGUE

With the score 6-6, Jackson hit his home run to right off reliever Cliff Young.

After Jackson's homer in the fifth, Chicago added three runs on Joey Cora's run-scoring single and a two-run single by Bell.

Jackson, trying to come back from hip replacement surgery, entered the game with only three r.b.i. in 42 at-bats.

The Indians, who got home runs from Carlos Martinez and Paul Sorrento, rallied from a 5-0 deficit to take a 6-5 lead.

Cleveland has lost three straight games, and five in a row on the road.

The White Sox pounded Indians starter Matt Young for five first-inning runs on three homers. Young gave up five hits and walked four in two and one-third innings.

Lance Johnson walked and Thomas and Bell followed with back-to-back homers. After Robin Ventura walked, Burks homered to put the White Sox ahead, 5-0.

Chicago catcher Carlton Fisk was ejected by the plate umpire, Larry Young, for arguing a called ball on a 2-2 pitch to Lance Parrish with two outs and a runner on first in the second. Parrish was signed by the Indians on Friday out of the Los Angeles organization.

Brewers 6, Red Sox 3

Cal Eldred bounced back from two shaky outings for his fourth victory as host Milwaukee beat Boston.

Eldred (4-3), who had allowed nine earned runs in a combined seven and one-third innings in his two previous starts, blanked the Red Sox for six innings on five hits. He pitched seven-plus innings and allowed three runs on nine hits.

Doug Henry got the final three outs for his sixth save.

The Brewers, shut out by 1-0 on three hits Friday night, gave Eldred a 3-0 lead in the first inning.

But in the seventh with Milwaukee leading by 4-0, Eldred gave up singles to Ivan Calderon and Bob Melvin and then pinch-hitter Ernest Riles, batting .105 with one run batted in in 19 at-bats, hit a three-run homer to right.

Milwaukee added two runs in the in the bottom of the inning off Tony Fossas. John Jaha singled and Bill Doran walked and with two outs, Pat Listach beat out an infield hit to first, although replays showed that reliever Ken Ryan apparently covered the bag in time. By the time Ryan turned around and threw home, Jaha scored from second.

Boston's Paul Quantrill (2-1), the former University of Wisconsin pitcher making his first major league start, made a wild throw on leadoff hitter Listach's bunt in the first inning. Quantrill, normally a reliever who was starting because Frank Viola has a sprained ankle, pitched only three innings.

"I got the ball jammed between my fingers and threw it away," Quantrill said. "It just felt like it was going to be one of those days where nothing was going to go right and it didn't. We kind of let things get away from us."

Orioles 6, Blue Jays 3

Damon Buford's two-run double sparked a five-run fifth inning as Baltimore beat Toronto at the Skydome.

Rookie Doug Linton (0-1) walked Sherman Obando to start the fifth, Tim Hulett followed with a single and Harold Reynolds walked to load the bases. Buford then hit his two-run double, but Reynolds was thrown out at the plate attempting to score from first base.

After Brady Anderson walked, Mark McLemore chased Linton with a two-run triple. Cal Ripken Jr. greeted reliever Tony Castillo with a run-scoring double for the fifth run of the inning.

Rick Sutcliffe (3-2) pitched six innings for his first victory since April 16. He gave up five runs and three hits. Todd Frohwirth worked three hitless innings for his second save.

"We scored five runs in an inning and then played great defense after that to win the game," Sutcliffe said. "I've had the flu for about a week. I also struggled with my location but it got better at times and I was able to get some good hitters out."

Linton pitched four and one-third innings after being recalled from Class AAA Syracuse on Friday. He allowed five runs and four hits.

"For the first four innings I wasn't behind the hitters," Linton said. "In the fifth it was a complete reversal."

Devon White gave the Blue Jays a 1-0 lead in the first inning with his second home run of the season. It was the 13th time White has led off a game with homer for Toronto.

S.E.C. Signs Deal With Peach Bowl

ATLANTA (AP) — The Southeastern Conference and the Peach Bowl have reached an agreement that will send a top-ranked S.E.C. team to the post-season game to meet an opponent from the Atlantic Coast Conference.

The bowl is currently in the second year of a three-year agreement with the A.C.C.

Under the agreement, the Peach Bowl will choose an S.E.C. team after the first three teams have been selected as part of the conference's contractual agreements with other bowls.

BASEBALL

Whoever's on First, He Probably Isn't Hitting What You Expect

By MURRAY CHASS

Surprises abound among first basemen this season. Who would have expected Andres Galarraga, John Olerud and Mo Vaughn to soar into the stratosphere of hitting? Who would have expected Fred McGriff, Will Clark and Rafael Palmeiro to wallow in a morass of weak hitting?

Then there are J. T. Snow, a promising rookie whose early season brilliance has melted into a startling slump, and Glenn Davis, an enigmatic veteran whose early career stardom has deteriorated in a meteoric dive.

Not so surprising: the mashing by Mark McGwire and the mediocrity of Don Mattingly. Not to mention the Orestes-Destrade-is-no-Cecil-Fielder development.

Destrade is the first baseman whom the expansion Florida Marlins lured back from Japan for a second run at the major leagues. Although the Marlins knew it was too much to expect the second coming of Fielder, they could hope, couldn't they?

Destrade, who turned 31 years old yesterday, has five more months to match Fielder's impressive return, but the first month has been no contest. In the Marlins' first 29 games, Destrade has batted .250, hit two home runs and driven in 18 runs. In the Tigers' first 29 games in 1990, Fielder batted .287, hit 12 home runs and drove in 28 runs.

Fielder went on to become the first player to lead the major leagues in runs batted in for three successive seasons since the r.b.i. became an official statistic in 1920.

McGriff has hit more than 30 home runs for five successive seasons, the longest current stretch in the majors, but he has hit only 4 this season. A producer of more than 100 runs batted in each of the last two seasons, he had driven in only 9 runs going into the Padres' game yesterday at Chicago.

At the core of McGriff's problems is a .202 batting average. On the other hand, Tino Martinez, Seattle's first baseman, was hitting only .168 going into the Mariners' game with the Twins last night, but 7 of his 17 hits have been home runs.

Clark, suddenly hitting in an unaccustomed position — in the shadow of Barry Bonds — had a .222 average, 1 home run and 11 runs batted in going into the Giants' game with the Dodgers yesterday. Palmeiro, a .296 career hitter with .300-plus averages two of the past three seasons, had a .210 average going into the Rangers' game last night.

Mattingly, whose bat has usually been absent from the Yankees' April lineup and now is shorn of power because of a back condition, slept through a 0-for-21 streak, worst of his career, and is hitting .254 with 1 home run and 9 runs batted in.

McGwire Bounces Back

McGwire, in contrast, returned from an absence forced by a back ailment and unleashed a torrent of home runs, swatting two each three times in a nine-game span.

Snow hit 6 home runs in California's first 13 games; he batted .407 and drove in 17 runs in the first 15 games. But he has hit no more home runs, and in the Angels' 11 games preceding last night against the A's, he had 3 hits in 38 times at-bat (.079) and 3 r.b.i., his average plummeting 135 points to .272.

Davis, whom Baltimore was counting on in its quest for a division championship, has shown no signs of emerging from his two-year doldrum, hitting .195 with 1 home run and 8 r.b.i. Going into the Orioles' game at Toronto yesterday, he had 17 hits in 87 times at bat compared with 34 in 94 for Vaughn, 39 in 96 for Olerud and 42 in 112 for Galarraga. Going into yesterday's games, Vaughn was hitting .362, Olerud .406 and Galarraga .375. Galarraga also leads all first basemen with 29 r.b.i.

Do Not Disturb

Reverse the numbers in Chad Kreuter's career batting average — .205 — and the resulting figure wouldn't be much higher than his average entering Detroit's weekend series against the Yankees.

"The running joke on the team is keep me asleep," Kreuter said. "I feel the same way. I don't want to wake up. I want to stay comatose and go through the season like that. I don't expect to stay up at .460 or anywhere close to it, but I'm not going to complain."

Kreuter, who last season and at the start of this was the Tigers' backup to catcher Mickey Tettleton, has forced Tettleton to all other parts of the field — first base, left field, right field — while he has planted himself behind the plate.

In soaring to a .462 average before the weekend (he dropped to .449 Friday night), Kreuter reversed his previous early-season pattern. In 1989, the Texas Rangers sent him to the minors after he began the season 0-for-14. The next year, an 0-for-18 start earned him a demotion to the minors. In 1991, he began the season with the Rangers but played in only three games, didn't get a hit in four times at bat and wound up making that trip again.

His defensive abilities won him a job with the Tigers last year, his eighth as a professional, and he responded by hitting .253. Still, that performance offered no indication of what he would do early this season.

Better Prepared

"I'm just going out there to help the team win," said Kreuter, a 28-year-old switch-hitter. "I'm in a good groove swinging. I attribute that to a good group of veterans who have helped prepare me at the plate mentally. I know what to expect when I go up to face the pitcher."

Kreuter certainly has landed with a band of productive hitters and now has become one of them. As if the Tigers needed another.

"I've never had the opportunity to play in the big leagues like this," he said. "I've always been a bench player. This is the first stretch where I've played more than five or six games in a row. I'm getting a chance to play every day behind the plate."

Tettleton was the catcher in six of the first eight games, but Kreuter has supplanted him in 16 of the last 19, outhitting Tettleton (.195) by more than 250 points in the process.

"What surprises me is I'm hitting above .500 from the left side," Kreuter said. Before this season, he hit .182 left-handed, .290 right-handed; this season he has hit .548 left-handed, .296 right-handed. In fact, he has 23 hits in 42 attempts left-handed, compared with 12 in 66 previously.

"I had a strong off-season weight program," he said, trying to explain the difference. "I gained 15 pounds through my program, and I hit a lot. I emphasized my legs because I needed a stronger base. I concentrated 80 percent of the workouts on my legs. Most hitting instructors say the swing starts with your base. It's really helped. I've hit four home runs already. I had only two last year, and my previous high was five."

Kreuter's weight went from about 187 to 202. His batting average has risen even more dramatically.

NOTEBOOK

Powerless Feeling

Damon Buford, the rookie center fielder whom the Baltimore Orioles summoned from the minor leagues last week, hit his first home run last Thursday in only his eighth time at bat. Otis Nixon of Atlanta has batted 119 times this season without a home run. Nixon, in fact, leads the major leagues in home-run futility. No one has batted as many times and failed to hit a home run.

Nixon, yesterday, passed Vince Coleman of the Mets, who slipped to second place with 118 at-bats without a home run.

Following on the futility list, entering yesterday's games, were Willie McGee of San Francisco, 112; Royce Clayton of San Francisco, 107, and George Bell of the Chicago White Sox and Barry Larkin of Cincinnati, 106 each.

The most surprising name on that list is Bell, who has 252 career home runs. Luis Polonia of California, last year's winner with 577 homer-free at-bats, is among the leaders this season with 101, one behind Ozzie Smith of St. Louis, who was second last season with 518; Brett Butler of Los Angeles, and Kenny Lofton of Cleveland. Omar Vizquel of Seattle, third last year with 483 at-bats, dropped out of the race early this season, hitting a home run in the sixth game.

Jeff Blauser of Atlanta, who hit one home run Thursday night and added two Friday night, was one of two players who hit their first home run last week after batting more than 100 times without one. The other was Don Mattingly of the Yankees, who connected last Tuesday on his 102d at-bat.

Bites, Not Nibbles

With a 4-0 record, a 1.29 earned run average and shares of three of the Seattle Mariners' major league-leading six shutouts, Erik Hanson bears no resemblance to the pitcher who led the majors with 17 losses last season.

"He's pitching aggressive again," Lou Piniella, the Mariners' manager, said of the right-hander, who had an 18-9 record in 1990. "He's going after the hitters, getting ahead in the count and he's throwing strikes. That's the major difference I see from watching his films from last year and watching him throw this year. Last year he was always behind in the count, nibbling here and there."

Piniella said that he and Sammy Ellis, the pitching coach, stressed in the spring to all of their pitchers, but especially to Hanson, the following: "Let's go after the hitter; don't get into a 3-2 count. Put him away early. Throw 100 pitches and be close to pitching a complete game."

Hanson obviously was listening.

No Respect at All

Scott Sanderson is the Rodney Dangerfield of baseball. In 1990, he won 17 games for Oakland and wanted to sign a new contract there, but the Athletics, without asking him, said he would be too expensive for them and sold him to the Yankees.

He led the Yankees in victories in 1991-92 with 28, but they opted not to exercise their option for this season. The 36-year-old right-hander went through the winter with little interest from other teams, then signed with the California Angels on the eve of spring training. Quietly, but typically, he has compiled a 4-1 record with a 2.79 e.r.a.

Tim Wakefield, Pittsburgh's knuckleballer, has walked 24 batters in his last three starts. Bob Tewksbury of St. Louis walked 25 all of last season in 32 starts and 233 innings. Tewksbury has walked two batters in 32⅔ innings this season. Wakefield has walked 40 in 47 innings.

Media and Fans Show Hypocrisy

To the Sports Editor:

Why am I not outraged about the way Dale Hunter hit on Pierre Turgeon? The broadcaster and columnist Mike Lupica inadvertently gave me the answer.

The day after the incident, Lupica used the words "punk" and "thug" to describe Hunter on WFAN. Fair enough. But 15 minutes later, Lupica told a caller how he regularly used to write newspaper columns about the Islanders during their glory days. Further, he described how tough it was to interview goaltender Billy Smith (a player regularly penalized for using his stick to attack opposing players). Lupica joked that interviewing Smith was tough "especially if he brought along his stick."

In a nutshell, this describes the hypocrisy of the New York fans and news media over this issue. The complaints being made about Hunter are not due to his actions, but simply because he is one of "them," not one of "us."

N.H.L. Violence Obscures Game

To the Sports Editor:

This year, the hockey team at Brown University, where I am a first-year student, had a remarkable season, advancing to the ECAC finals and making the National Collegiate Atheltic Association tournament for the first time in 15 years. The Bears brought out fans in incredible numbers to witness well-played games full of suspense and excitement.

College hockey fans are not at games to witness violence; they are there to support their team 100 percent. Why can't pro hockey fans appreciate the game itself? The reason is that every game is plagued by one or more inane brawls and scuffles.

The problem with the N.H.L. is that it does not throw players out for fighting. At most, a player will get a penalty for two to five minutes, then come back on the ice for more of his old tricks. If the referees were stricter on the penalties and issue major game misconducts, fighting would stop completely. In college hockey, the last situation a player wants is a fight because he knows he is probably a valuable asset to his team, and he realizes that fighting will probably cost him ice time.

Dale Hunter should have been kicked out of the league, with no opportunity to return, and the N.H.L. should immediately adopt stricter rules against fighting.

Valvano No Saint

To the Sports Editor:

While Jim Valvano might have been a funny guy and an inspirational leader, he and coaches of his ilk were — to say the least — anything but people to be admired. Sometimes death causes the living to glorify the deceased and, more important, to ignore their faults. When he coached, Jim Valvano was exactly what the National Collegiate Athletic Association was trying to get rid of. His goal was to win, no matter what rules were broken.

There is no question that he was a great basketball coach. But the young men whom he coached were nothing more than tools in his quest for national recognition. As a coach, if his athletes were not doing what he wanted (as he much later reported), why didn't he throw them off the team? That answer is simple: How can you win if your stars are not playing?

He accepted the acclaim when his team of "student-athletes" won the national championship; he certainly should have accepted everything else that went along with that: the truancy and the low graduation rate.

Please let's not sanctify the man; he was not glorious. He used kids to further his ego. Would he still have been coaching if the N.C.A.A. hadn't put pressure on North Carolina State? Would he have gotten his TV job if he had not broken the rules and won?

Transference And Coaches

To the Sports Editor:

Coaches are beginning to discover what psychotherapists have understood for years ("When Coaches Cross the Line," The Times, May 2). Intimate situations wherein one adult cares for or teaches another individual evoke strong emotions that psychiatrists call "transference." These emotions often include loving and sexual feelings. Emotions specific to the professional situation can often be misunderstood as personal by either party or both.

Most therapists do respect boundaries with patients, but some don't. If even health professionals, who are trained to watch for and address such emotions, and whose codes of practice forbid such behavior, can still give in to them, one can only guess at the risk coaches face of crossing boundaries.

Recognition and handling of transferential issues should be an educational requirement for coaches and others in similar positions of responsibility.

When Teacher's Pet Falls Prey to Teacher's Petting

My friend the former world-class swimmer has never quite separated out her sex life from her sports-conditioned role as a pleaser of men. In dank locker rooms that stank of chlorine, her age-group coach would stroke her to orgasm in reward for a personal best. She was flattered yet confused by his attentions, and later devastated when he began spending time with a younger, faster swimmer.

She never fulfilled her early potential, and hung on in sports by becoming the mistress of a leading official who would dash up to her hotel room between Olympic committee meetings. She spun off into hippiedom and drugs for years.

She finally found a way of her own through poetry and dance. But for a very long time she had thought it was all her fault, that she had led the coach on, a Lolita in goggles, or that at least she had allowed it to happen, an accomplice in her own exploitation. Only now, as more women are talking among themselves and even coming forward with intimate testimony, is she beginning to understand, with as much pain as enlightenment, that what happened to her was not even special.

Her story is 30 years old and it was old before it happened to her. Unfortunately, it is happening still, and there may very well be an increase in cases of the abuse and exploitation of female athletes by male coaches these days as the opportunities for money and fame expand for women. More and more parents seem willing to abdicate their responsibilities and thrust their daughters under the power of coaches. More and more ambitious male coaches seem eager to coach women.

In fact, many male athletic administrators believe, or at least claim, that female athletes perform better for male coaches than for female coaches. They say that men have greater power to "motivate" women because society has set them up as authority figures.

Male administrators will rarely go on to say that smart and devious motivators know that sexual tension and/or the simulation of a father-daughter relationship is yet another way to coax greater effort from women athletes. There is an ugly quality of psychic rape to this, at the least an irresponsibility in the name of winning. In some ways, this emotional abuse seems even worse than the physicality that occurs when teacher's pet turns into teacher's petting.

Ironically, male coaches, and even some female coaches, have been known to warn the parents of female athletic prospects against a "predatory lesbian" coach, invariably a rival.

While there are plenty of lesbians in sports, anecdotal evidence points to heterosexual abuse and harassment as a greater threat. In recent weeks, there have been rape allegations against a popular male Westchester skating coach, as well as the suicide of a popular male tennis coach after his attempt to kidnap a teen-age former student was foiled.

It seems likely that more former athletes who have been manipulated and abused in both subtle and brutal ways will come forward. As in the deluge of revelations about rape and incest, there are long-dammed feelings of rage and shame. Athletes in such individual sports as swimming, tennis, gymnastics, track and field and figure skating have felt particularly isolated, fearful, even unique.

And there is guilt. There can be no denying the pleasure young women have felt as objects of a coach who used the romantic intensity of their relationship to make them work harder, run faster.

Two more old stories:

My friend the former world-class gymnast competed for her father, who was her first coach. The long hours, the physical suffering, the sacrifice of a "normal" girlhood, were all gifts to Dad. When it became apparent that she would have to leave home for a better coach if she were to make the Olympics, there was family turmoil that included her mother and her siblings; so much of the family's chemistry involved Coach Dad and his little star.

Dad was, of course, jealous. He often subverted the new coach's training with phone calls and unexpected visits, and he tried to make his daughter jealous by training other girls back home. Eventually, she won medals for her new "dad" but then became injured in a suspicious way that has always seemed a kind of declaration of physical bankruptcy, a way of opting out of the emotional arena.

My friend the former child tennis hopeful may have been luckiest of all. Despite her mother's experience as a regional star alternately fondled and slapped by a male coach, her mother pushed her daughter to play for a coach with a "sexy" reputation; he had once before left a wife and children for a student. My friend soon noticed that another student was receiving more pats and murmurs than she was. Jealous, she began to "punish" her teacher — or perhaps call out for more attention — by losing matches she should have won. She eventually took up with a local biker, created a scene, quit.

That was years ago. She now plays well at the club level when the bond market allows. She's happy. And she thinks that she was a lucky escapee from a system that rewards "bringing it home to daddy." She thinks that's worse than drugs or cheating — for women, perhaps the most destructive winning technique in all of sports.

Boxing's Brutal Intimacies Require a Careful Look at AIDS

By ARLENE SCHULMAN

Could boxing — a violent, passionate pas de deux where blood, from noses, mouths and tender eyelids, stains the other, and where it is sometimes difficult to tell who has actually been cut — be a dance of death?

The cornerman, sometimes wearing protective gloves, sometimes not, and almost never in the gym, creases the boxer's skin as he tries to stop the bleeding. Sometimes he is successful, sometimes he is not.

At a time when AIDS is prevalent and has made its impact on sports and several of its superstars, the risks in contact sports have yet to be thoroughly investigated. And in such an intimate a sport as boxing, it needs to be researched and investigated, for no other sport has the physical contact that boxing does, in the ring and in the gym, between fighter and opponent and fighter and trainer. The boxer wears no uniform, no armor, no protection.

A prominent boxing official once said that the prime groups at risk for AIDS — homosexuals and drug users — are excluded from the boxing world. How could this possibly be true? One former boxer has said that he had numerous homosexual encounters. In a sport where macho posturing precludes such a disclosure, there surely must be others.

Many men and boys arrive at the gym — some from prison and some from the streets, some as reformed drug addicts preaching the recovery sermon of their new lives.

Palacio Loses Title

The former World Boxing Organization featherweight champion Ruben Palacio of Colombia tested positive for the virus that causes AIDS last month, and was stripped of his title and forbidden to box by the W.B.O. It is not clear when or how Palacio, the first boxer to be identified publicly as testing positive for H.I.V., contracted the virus.

The former lightweight champion Esteban de Jesus died of complications from AIDS in 1989; he was 37 and weighed less than 90 pounds. De Jesus and his brother, who died of AIDS in 1985, reportedly shared syringes of cocaine and heroin at a time when de Jesus was still an active fighter.

In 1989, the World Health Organization concluded that "there is possible very low risk of H.I.V. transmission through sports participation which would principally involve the combative sports with direct body contact...." The report recommended that when bleeding occurs, activity should be stopped and the wound cleansed and covered.

"For transmission of H.I.V. or AIDS through blood to occur," the report continued, "the blood of an infected person must contaminate a lesion, wound or mucous membrane of another person..." The risk, it said, is "theoretically possible."

There is a huge difference between low risk and none at all. Testing for H.I.V. should be mandatory before each bout on both a professional and an amateur level to eliminate any risk there may be of transmission. Civil rights and public-health laws of most states, including New York, prohibit testing as a requirement for employment and protect an individual's privacy. But a stockbroker or a secretary or a salesperson does not become as intimate with colleagues or customers as a boxer does with his opponents.

Paying the Price

Each state athletic commission should seek a waiver on these civil rights and public-health laws. And because the price of testing may be prohibitive for small promoters, the cost should be borne by each commission as part of its annual budget, just as medical testing is. Or the commissions should consider joint programs with local health departments.

Nevada, the only state with mandatory AIDS testing, has tested boxers since 1987, and in over six years, only one has tested positive. But Nevada tests only once during the calendar year, when a boxer applies for a license. A boxer could be negative in January but positive in February, and then fight for 10 months until he is tested again the next year.

The British Board of Boxing Control also requires a fighter to be tested when he applies for a license. In addition, each time a fighter enters England to compete, he must be tested. In seven years of testing in Britain, three fighters, including Palacio, have tested positive for H.I.V. Only one fighter has refused to be tested.

Except in cases where Nevada's testing is timely, there is nothing to prevent a man who is H.I.V. positive from entering the ring in the United States. One boxing promoter was asked if he would sacrifice a large payday should his fighter come to him just before a bout and confide about being H.I.V. positive. The promoter replied, without hesitating, "I would allow him to fight and I wouldn't tell anyone."

It may be years before testing becomes mandatory in New York State or in other states, if it ever does, because of politics, dissent and lack of a governing body in boxing. It is the moral responsibility of every fighter, just as it is for every person who believes that he may be at risk, to be tested for H.I.V. And it is his responsibility to retire quietly or to disclose it to his state athletic commission if he chooses.

One former world champion said that he had never been tested for H.I.V. His reasoning: "I'm leaving myself in God's hands."

Another said that he had been tested twice, and recalled that one of his opponents had refused to fight him unless he was tested. He said that he wasn't sure what he would do if he tested positive. "I wouldn't want to be in the ring with someone who tested positive," he said, "but what do I know about the person that I'm getting in there with?"

The fighter is once again segregated by ignorance, politics, greed and a false sense of immortality. In a sport where job security and unemployment benefits do not exist, and where many do not have health or life insurance, or a pension plan, AIDS is something that happens to someone else.

Shell Life: The Art and Science of Harvesting Oysters

One of the charms of gathering oysters is that they cannot elude you. Immobile and visible, they await your depredations.

Inclement weather and other factors can get in the way of an oyster expedition, however, which is why my companion, Ruth Kirchmeier, and I have made only two such sorties thus far this spring. We harvest oysters on Tisbury Great Pond on Martha's Vineyard Island, Mass., a salt pond that is periodically opened to the ocean with a bulldozer. One purpose of the openings is to maintain the proper salinity for the bivalves to grow and reproduce.

When we first thought of oystering in March, the pond was closed and the water too deep for wading. Then, after the pond was opened, there were days on end when strong northerly winds churned up waves against the spot we planned to visit, which is hard against the barrier beach separating the pond from the ocean. It is possible to gather oysters by hand, as opposed to dragging a dredge behind a boat, when the water is rough, but it is a lot easier when the water is smooth and they can be seen on the bottom.

My oystering gear includes chest waders, a potato fork and a wire basket that is floated by an inner tube. I tether the basket to me on a short length of line.

Although I gather all the single oysters I can, most of them come in clumps. This is because succeeding generations of oyster larva, or spat, need something rough, slime-free and hard on which to anchor themselves. Failing this, they will suffocate in mud or silt. Because the oysters I harvest are usually in bunches, separating them and discarding those that are dead or too small is part of the ritual. Ruth goes to work on the first batch I bring to shore and I go forth again, until I estimate that I have enough — after culling — to fill our weekly family limit of one bushel.

We bring along an 18-inch-long section of a broken shovel handle and a small piece of plywood to serve as an operating table. One sharp rap will usually dislodge one bivalve from another. On our most recent trip, Ruth broke several shells with her club, but was not dismayed. Tilting her head back, she put each one to her lips, quaffed its juices and savored its flesh with the sound of the surf and the anxious cries of nesting Canada geese in her ears. At such a time and place, raw oysters are best without condiment.

Thinking of the spat that will be swarming in early summer, we return all discarded shells to the pond.

In some regions, oystering goes on year-round; in others, there are specific seasons. The old rule of gathering oysters only in the months containing the letter "r" has merit, because their flesh becomes thin and watery during the summer procreative process. Oysters begin life as males, with most of them switching sex after a year or so. If the law permits, one can gather oysters in May, June, July and August, but a high percentage of them will be in poor flesh. In salt ponds, like the one I frequent, oysters lose some of their zesty flavor when the pond is closed to the ocean for a long time, reducing its salinity. One can get around this to some extent by doing one's harvesting along the shore of the pond that borders the outer beach, a place where the salinity will be at its highest.

Another chore awaits the gatherer when he arrives home with his harvest: The oysters should be scrubbed in a bucket of water. This is a necessity if they are to be served on the half shell. Place them deep side down in a bucket or similar container, and — another of their charms — they will keep for weeks in a cool place. If oysters are stored on edge or with the deep side up, the life-sustaining liquid within them will usually drain away.

A treatise could be written on the art of opening an oyster, but for starters use a commercial oyster knife, either with a straight or curved-tip blade. There may come a time when you can shuck an oyster by holding it in one hand and opening it with the other, but begin by placing it on counter or table with, if you are right-handed, the hinge end away from you; hold it down with the heel of your left hand and go in from the right side, as you look at it. The goal is to make entry and sever the single adductor muscle, which is on the left side. It may take you almost a minute to open your first oyster, but persevere and you'll rapidly gain skill. A reasonable goal would be one oyster every 15 seconds. Their size and shape plays a roll in this; large or twisted specimens can slow you down.

If you are opening oysters for cooking, do it over a large bowl that will catch all the juices, which are used in many recipes, including stews, fritters and casseroles.

Oysters can be prepared in many ways, but whatever recipe you use remember to avoid overcooking; keep in mind that they really can't be underdone. For a simple New England stew, allow 8 oysters per person. Put the oysters and the liquid in a pot, and the moment the liquid begins to boil, remove from the heat. Add evaporated milk — twice as much milk as oyster liquid — several pieces of butter, a dash of pepper and slowly re-heat. (There's no need for salt in most instances.) This is a primitive oyster stew, but it is exceedingly good and tastes even better on the following day, if any is left over.

The '95 Cup: Koch May Well Skip It

By BARBARA LLOYD

Time is running out for Bill Koch's self-imposed deadline for resolving a major predicament: whether to campaign for the America's Cup defense of 1995, or to be content with the glory of his 1992 cup victory.

"I'm leaning 60, 70, 80 percent toward not doing it again," Koch said last week in a telephone interview from his home in West Palm Beach, Fla. "But that's not to say I won't wake up one morning and say, 'To heck with it all, I'm going to do it.'"

Koch has given himself until the middle of this month to decide. Moving at his own pace, and ignoring official deadlines, he is taking advantage of the edge gained by his decisive America's Cup victory last year.

"Where does an elephant sleep?" he said last winter. "He sleeps wherever he wants."

The Money Problem

A strong consideration for his future plans has to do with money — lots of it. Koch spent $88 million, most of it his own, to defend the cup in 1992. Not only did the last go-round cut into Koch's personal fortune, a pitfall that he has vowed to avoid in the future, but it also robbed him of time for other pursuits.

"I'm just digesting a study on how much money we could raise if I do it again, and how much time it would take from my business and my son," Koch said.

The 51-year-old Koch, an oil heir from Kansas, oversees business interests that range from computer chips to alternative-energy sources. He usually divides his time between homes in West Palm Beach and Osterville, Mass. The cup races in San Diego last year forced him to spend months away from his son, Wyatt, who is now 6.

Still, the personal ties that inevitably bind a victorious America's Cup team are likely to influence his decision about 1995. This weekend, team members from the 1992 campaign have gathered in Kansas for the Wichita River Festival, an annual fete along the Arkansas River shoreline.

The 10-day river celebration happens to coincide with the anniversary of America²'s 4-1 defeat of Italy in the cup races last spring.

Koch, who is considered a Wichita sports luminary, has donated one of his America's Cup contenders, the 75-foot Jayhawk, as a permanent display on the river.

The Arkansas River Foundation, a local nonprofit group, wants to raise money for developing a public boathouse at the festival site. Koch has agreed on a matching grant of $500,000 to pay for half of the $1 million project. He also plans to donate a silver replica of the America's Cup.

Despite this kind of preoccupation with the cup by Koch, skeptics think he might choose to sit out the 1995 racing series. By doing so, they speculate, he could anticipate that a challenger from outside the United States might win the 142-year-old trophy from the San Diego Yacht Club.

The outcome would then allow Koch to win back the America's Cup from another country in 1998, but on his terms — for whatever United States yacht club he chooses as a sponsor.

Koch concedes that it is a tempting scenario, but unrealistic. "That's something we thought about," he said. "But that's five years away. Who knows what changes might have taken place in the rules by then? And to tell you the truth, I don't know if I would have the passion for it by then."

Although two of his boats from 1992, Kanza and America³, may still be competitive for 1995, Koch seems unwilling to go to battle again in the name of the San Diego Yacht Club.

Nowhere in the sport has he rankled sailors more than within the sun-speckled confines of San Diego's waterside clubhouse. In a speech at the club last January, Koch chastised members for what he viewed as their inhospitality to America³ crewmen last year, and the club's failure in organizing a suitable cup event.

Koch subsequently sent the club a letter of apology, acknowledging that "things get blown out of proportion when emotions creep in."

Bill Munster, chairman of the club's 1995 cup defense committee, said last week that he wasn't expecting Koch to race in 1995. "We'd love to have him," Munster said, noting that Koch's letter helped to mend the rift. "But we can survive without him. We have two strong groups, and they can take the load."

The leader of one of those defense groups, Kevin Mahaney, sees Koch's absence in larger terms. "From the United States point of view, it's a great loss not to have Bill there," Mahaney said. "It's a team effort, and if you lose Bill, you lose America's best."

MAKING WAVES

The Wichita River Festival became the focus of a political maelstrom between PRESIDENT CLINTON and ROBERT DOLE, the Senate Minority Leader. Their dispute centered on the waterfront building being restored for the Wichita Boathouse project. Misinformation apparently fueled the official bickering about an outstanding Federal Housing and Urban Development grant that was never repaid by the boathouse's former occupant, a senior citizens center. But by the start of the festival Friday, Clinton and Dole had settled their differences and, together, wished Wichita's participants smooth sailing.

Temple Continues Streak At the Dad Vail Regatta

By WILLIAM N. WALLACE

Special to The New York Times

PHILADELPHIA, May 8 — Temple continued its domination of the Dad Vail regatta's marquee event, winning the men's varsity eights championship today for the fifth year in a row and the 10th time in the past 11 here on the Schuylkill River.

The Owls were too far ahead to even worry much about a late surge by the Georgetown boat that finished second, 3.1 seconds back.

George Washington placed third, followed by Miami, Florida Tech and Hobart. The race for women's varsity eights was won by Georgetown, with George Washington second and Temple third.

Temple's success year after year may be the reason some coaches are beginning to skip the Dad Vail, the nation's largest college rowing competition, which this year had almost a 20 percent drop in entries. That is the theory of Jack Galloway, the Dad Vail president.

Fordham Loses Skeg and Race

This is an open event, meaning any crew that wishes can enter and race. For the 55th edition, run well again by the organizing committee, there were 395 crews from 83 colleges.

One was Fordham, which won a silver medal with its women's lightweight four and lost a race it expected to win in the men's lightweight eights.

In the men's case, there was an equipment failure before the race began that the Ram oarsmen did not know about. The boat had lost its skeg, the metal keel plate on the bottom vital to steering. The coxswain, Sarah Sprague, could not get the boat to steer properly and Fordham was out of contention after 50 strokes. The Rams, seeded first and undefeated in this event this season, finished fifth among six finalists as Western Ontario won for the second year in a row.

"I knew something had to have gone wrong," said the Fordham coach, Ted Bonanno, standing by the finish line. "We wouldn't row that poorly."

This was the best crew he had ever assembled at Fordham and one that will have two more regattas to prove that contention.

So Bonanno, who has nurtured the Fordham program into a small-college force, had to be content with the women's medal.

The Fordham program is one that operates more on ingenuity than cash flow. Rowing at Fordham is a club, rather than varsity, sport, which means the participants have to foot most of the bill for the program, including coaches' salaries.

The boathouse is part of an abandoned power plant on the west bank of the cranky Harlem River, with its unforgiving current and debris.

The women's four, which had the favored inside lane of the 2,000-meter course on the Schuylkill, rowed a steady race in second place and did not have the speed to challenge Marietta at the end. The victors, who had beaten the Rams by five seconds in the morning semifinal event, won in 7 minutes 35.97 seconds.

ABOUT CARS/Marshall Schuon

Ford's SHO, an Ocelot in Bull's Clothing

Ford Motor Company

The SHO, top of the Taurus line, adds an optional automatic transmission this year. A spoiler, also new, incorporates a high-mounted brake light.

ONE of the bad things about driving a passel of cars is that they all run together in the mind. Ask anyone who travels a lot and rents a different car at each airport. They'll say they liked the last car, really liked it. They'll say it was a Pontiac Grand Am. Or, wait, maybe a Toyota?

It may be a failure of concentration or just ennui. But what it amounts to is multihued confusion, even when you're paying attention, and I can guarantee my own occasional fuddle.

One of the good things about running through a lot of automobiles, of course, is that the true winners stand out. And you know a winner when you see it. When you drive cars to eke out a living (pity me, pity me), the standout is the vehicle that you routinely get into while ignoring the other three or four in the driveway.

That definitely is the case with Ford's 1993 Taurus SHO (take-home price, $25,354), and never mind that one of those other cars out there costs twice as much.

The fact that Ford's Taurus is so good is undoubtably the reason that it has overtaken the Honda Accord as the best-selling car in America, an event that occurred on Jan. 5 or 6. Ford isn't positive, and it's reassuring that the companies, too, get confused.

What Ford is sure of and is dancing corporate jigs about is that Taurus was a billion-dollar gamble that paid off. The car, introduced as a 1986 model, was a risk as a front-drive and somewhat different (read h-o-m-e-l-y) four-door sedan.

The cars are built in Atlanta and Chicago, and the lineup includes GL and LX models, available in both sedans and wagons. The sedans have a standard 3-liter V6, while the LX wagon is powered by a 3.8-liter V6 with a four-speed automatic overdrive transaxle.

The SHO, though, is something special. Its letters stand for Super High Output, and it is a world-class sport sedan, with an amazingly powerful 24-valve V6, made for Ford by Yamaha in Japan.

The car that I drove to the exclusion of the other fancy stuff in the driveway was painted a dark metallic green, and it had all of the new-for-'93 goodies.

> The fact that the Taurus is so good probably explains why it has replaced Honda's Accord as America's top seller.

For a start, there was the optional automatic transmission, which is now coupled to an enlarged 3.2-liter version of the 3-liter engine that, with a five-speed manual transmission, continues as the standard SHO engine.

The 220-horsepower engine, mounted sideways, lives under a hood that rises on dual gas struts. And the hood, with its black accoustic pad proclaiming "SHO" is well worth opening when you want to impress the Joneses, because it reveals a vista of polished-aluminum intake tubes and a truly wondrous jungle of machinery.

At the other end, a new spoiler graces the trunk, whose cavern is medium-large and will swallow 18 cubic feet of luggage. Unfortunately, there is a thigh-high liftover, but that is one of the very few complaints about the car.

Indeed, Ford has filled the new Taurus SHO with almost every possible gadget, including a remote entry system that works at a goodly distance. The driver's keychain can open all the doors and the trunk, and there is a "panic" button to sound an alarm (headlights flash and horn blows) if muggers threaten.

Outside, there are simple six-spoke wheels in cast aluminum, and the SHO carries tires that are an inch larger than the 15-inch tires on its lesser brethren. Bumpers are integrated and body-colored, and a front air dam incorporates driving lights.

Trim is of the blackout variety, although a thin strip of chrome accents the black molding around the side windows. Side-view mirrors are also done in black, as are the outside door handles, and the driver's door includes the combination lock that Ford pioneered in the 80's.

Four-wheel disk brakes are standard, along with an antilock system, and the safety features include dual air bags. Inside, the green test car had wall-to-wall tan leather, with fully adjustable power buckets in front. The seats are soft for comfort, but they offer good support as well.

The dash, featuring a 140-mile-an-hour speedometer, is both readable and easy to live with. It is genteel as well, with the usual caution about unleaded fuel amplified to say "Premium Recommended." There also is a small legend that says "Fuel Door," accompanied by an arrow pointing to the right. Handy if you forget or if someone else is driving and needs to pull up to the pump.

New, too, this year is speed-sensitive power steering and a leather-wrapped wheel whose entire hub serves as a horn. The window controls are in the armrests where they should be, and there is an express-down function for the driver's window.

There is, in fact, almost nothing to dislike in this Taurus, although I wish the radio was a bit friendlier. While the system includes both compact-disk and cassette players, all of the controls are flat buttons, and operation requires a driver's undivided attention.

That is a small quibble, though, and one that is easily forgotten out on the road, where the SHO's engineering — and engine — remind you of what driving is all about. The V6 moves the 3,084-pound four-door as if it were a sporty coupe, with zero-to-60 acceleration in about 7.5 seconds, and the car is rock solid at cruising speeds.

Despite the hot-rod performance, the five-passenger sedan delivers reasonable thrift, with consumption rated at 17 miles per gallon in the city and 26 on the highway. In deference to the potent engine, though, the tank's capacity has been increased to 18.4 gallons, about 2½ more than the standard Taurus.

That gives it a usable range of more than 450 miles, and that is just one more thing in favor of a car that has all the bells and whistles and will outperform much of the best from Europe or Japan. Add in what is a relatively low price, and you have a real bargain. It is certainly not one to forget.

NOW THE LEASE IS AS ATTRACTIVE AS THE CAR.

It's only fitting that a car as complete as the Infiniti® J30® should have a lease to match. We call it The Signature Lease *and it puts you behind the wheel of a J30 for only $399 a month for 36 months with $2,100 down and a $450 acquisition fee.

The Signature Lease
$399/36 months
Limited time offer.

To find out what this gets you, visit your local Infiniti showroom and ask the sales consultant to show you the J30 personal luxury sedan. You'll find a standard walnut-trimmed, leather-appointed interior, power sunroof, dual air bags and a Bose® Audio System with CD player. Under the hood you'll find a 3.0-liter, 210-horsepower engine. You'll also learn about our Total Ownership Experience,® a program that includes a 4- year/60,000-mile basic limited warranty, 24-hour Roadside Assistance and a free Infiniti loan car when yours is in for a scheduled service appointment.

To learn more about the J30 personal luxury sedan, visit your local Infiniti showroom today. And find out how we made a car that couldn't be more attractive, more attractive.

It's everything that's possible.

© 1993 Infiniti Division of Nissan Motor Corporation U.S.A. Bose is a registered trademark of Bose Corporation. *Limited-time rate of $399 for 36-month closed-end lease of a 1993 J30 available at participating Infiniti Dealers to qualified lessees through IFS. Subject to availability. Rate based on MSRP of $34,850 including freight and destination charges less consumer down payment of $2,100.00 and less required dealer capitalized cost reduction. Dealer participation may affect actual cost. Actual capitalized cost of $29,228.50. Taxes, registration, title, insurance, options, and locally required equipment not included in the lease rate and may be payable at consummation. INITIAL PAYMENT OF $2,949.00 (includes $2,100.00 CONSUMER DOWN PAYMENT, $399.00 FIRST MONTH PAYMENT, $450.00 NONREFUNDABLE ACQUISITION FEE) DUE AT CONSUMMATION. Total monthly payments $14,364.00. Purchase option may be available at the end of the lease for a purchase price not less than the residual value plus applicable sales tax. Lessee pays for maintenance, repairs, and excessive wear and tear as disclosed in lease agreement and mileage charge of $0.15/mile for mileage over 15,000 per year. With scheduled service appointments, at participating dealers. Subject to availability, offer good through July 2, 1993.

WHY OUTSPEND YOUR NEIGHBORS WHEN YOU CAN OUTSMART THEM INSTEAD?

You no longer have to spend a considerable fortune to raise a few eyebrows in the neighborhood.

For a relatively low $399* a month, you can immerse yourself in the luxury of an Acura Legend L. Or for $319* a month, you can enjoy the exhilarating performance of an Acura Vigor GS. Both sedans feature handsome leather-trimmed interiors and eight-speaker audio systems. As well as driver's and passenger's side air bags and four-wheel anti-lock brakes.

Not only is leasing an Acura Legend L or Vigor GS one of the smartest decisions you can make, but with monthly payments this low, you could conceivably afford to drive both. The neighbors aren't going to be happy. ACURA PRECISION CRAFTED PERFORMANCE

The Acura Luxury Lease Program.

Available through June 30, 1993, at participating Acura dealers to qualified lessees approved by American Honda Finance Corporation. Subject to availability. Advertised lease rate of $399/month is for a 48-month closed-end lease for the Legend L automatic (leather-trimmed interior) with MSRP of $34,165.00 and advertised lease rate of $319/month is for a 48-month closed-end lease for the Vigor GS automatic with MSRP of $28,065.00. Both Legend and Vigor rates include destination charges. Taxes, title, license and registration, insurance and optional equipment and services not included. Advertised rates based on a consumer payment of $1,000.00 (Legend and Vigor) as a prepaid rental reduction (down payment) and a dealer capitalized cost reduction of $2,791.75 for the Legend and $2,482.30 for the Vigor ($3,192.00 for Legend and $2,806.40 for Vigor in Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Maine, New York, Oklahoma and Utah where no security deposit is required); condition of dealer participation may affect actual rate. Consumer's $1,000.00 down payment, first month's lease payment, refundable security deposit equal to one month's payment rounded to the next highest $25.00 increment (except where security deposit not collected), title, license and registration fee, and tax to the extent applicable are due at lease signing. Total of monthly payments is $19,152.00 for Legend (plus tax as applicable) and $15,312.00 for Vigor (plus tax as applicable). Option to purchase at end of lease for purchase price of $16,057.55 for Legend and $12,067.95 for Vigor plus applicable tax and official fees except in Mississippi, New York and South Dakota where no purchase option is available. Lessee pays for maintenance, insurance, repairs and service, any and all taxes related to the vehicle or the lease, registration renewals, and excessive wear and use. Mileage charge of $.15/mile over 15,000 miles per year. A disposition fee of no more than $400.00 is due if vehicle is not purchased at the end of lease term. MSRP, dealer capital cost reduction and option-to-purchase price different in Alaska and Hawaii. See your participating Acura dealer for details. ©1993 Acura Division of American Honda Motor Co., Inc. Acura, Legend and Vigor are registered trademarks of Honda Motor Co., Ltd. HERE'S A LITTLE SOMETHING YOU MAY NOT KNOW ABOUT THE ACURA INTEGRA.

$500 down payment*

The Acura Integra engine is based on our Formula One race car. That's no secret. It has a double-wishbone front and rear suspension system for more nimble performance. Everybody knows that. It has a front-wheel-drive design for better control and safety. No surprise there. It has speed-sensitive, variable power-assisted, rack-and-pinion steering for crisp handling. Even that's well-known. But perhaps there is one more detail that has until this moment escaped your attention. The fact that for a limited time there's a lease program under which you can lease a 1993 Acura Integra for only $199 a month. An amazingly small fact to be sure. But one that comes as quite a large surprise to many people. ACURA

SEE YOUR TRI-STATE ACURA DEALER

Call 1-800-TO-ACURA for the dealer near you.

Available through May 31, 1993, at participating Tri-State Acura dealers to qualified lessees approved by GE Capital Auto Lease, Inc. Subject to availability. Advertised lease payment of $199/month available with consumer capitalized cost reduction of $500 for 36-month closed-end lease for the Integra RS 3-door 5-speed with MSRP of $15,315.00, including air conditioning, radio and destination charges. Taxes, title, license and registration, insurance and optional equipment and service not included. Advertised payment based on a consumer capitalized cost reduction of $500.00. Dealer participation and amount of consumer capitalized cost reduction may affect actual payment. Consumer's $500.00 capitalized cost reduction, first month's lease payment, title, license and registration fee, and tax to the extent applicable (and refundable security deposit equal to $250.00 in NJ and CT or last month's payment in NY) are due at lease signing. Total of monthly payments is $7,164.00 (plus tax as applicable). Closed-end fixed purchase price option at residual value of $8,883.00 plus $250.00 purchase fee plus applicable fees and taxes in CT, NJ and NY. Lessee pays for maintenance, insurance, repairs and service, any and all taxes related to the vehicle or the lease, registration renewals and excessive wear and use. Mileage charge of $.15 per mile over 12,000 miles per year. A disposition fee of $250.00 is due at the end of lease term. See your participating Acura dealer for details. © 1993 Acura Division of American Honda Motor Co., Inc. Acura and Integra are registered trademarks of Honda Motor Co., Ltd. $12,369 Honest.

AUDI 90 S LEASE.
Total monthly payments $11,970,
$399 a month for 30 months.
Plus $399 down payment.*

Audi THE 1993 AUDI 90 S.

This is definitely not another lease offer with hidden costs. In fact, it couldn't be more straightforward. Now you can drive a 1993 Audi 90 S for 30 months and you'll pay only $12,369.

That includes the minimal down payment ($399), the attractive monthly rate ($399), and the real flexibility of a 30-month term.

And there's more. You also receive the long list of benefits that make up the Audi Ownership Advantage. Including three years or 50,000 miles of no-charge scheduled maintenance. Tune-ups, oil changes, even wiper blades – we pay for virtually everything. Compare that to the competition.

The Audi 90 S – with its sleek elegance, V6 power and sophisticated safety systems. This is the complete package: the right car, the right numbers, the right protection plan. Honest.

For more information or the name and location of your nearest Audi dealer, please call 1-800-FOR-AUDI today.

* $399 down payment, $399 first month's payment and $400 refundable security deposit due at lease inception. Offered to qualified customers by VW Credit, Inc. through participating dealers until June 30, 1993. 30-month closed-end lease. Price based on $28,005 Manufacturer's Suggested Retail Price of Audi 90 S including auto. trans., power sunroof and destination charge (less dealer capitalized cost reduction, which could affect final negotiated transaction). Other options, dealer prep., taxes, registration extra. Lessee responsible for insurance. Monthly payments total $11,970. At lease end, lessee responsible for $0.10/mile over 37,500 miles and for damage and excessive wear. Option to purchase at lease end for $13,723 in example shown. See participating dealer for details. © 1993 Audi of America.

Now you can dream with both eyes wide open.

DREAMING COMES WITH ITS rewards these days. Because if you buy or lease a 1993 or 1994 Jaguar from your local Jaguar dealer and aren't satisfied, you can bring your car back in an undamaged condition within 30 days and your purchase price will be refunded.* What's more, the 1993 XJ6 also comes with a special lease: just $549 per month for 36 months, with a $2500 down payment. The lease includes a generous allowance of 45,000 miles, after which you'll pay just 15 cents a mile. For additional information, call or visit one of the Jaguar dealers listed below. And sweet dreams.

ONE GOOD THING THAT HAS COME OUT OF THIS ECONOMY,

BMW'S VERY AFFORDABLE LEASING AND FINANCE PROGRAMS.

BUT LIKE ALL GOOD THINGS, THEY WON'T BE AROUND FOR LONG.

There's never been a better time to lease or finance a 3, 5 or 7 series BMW thanks to very generous factory-assisted programs. And there's no better place to go to get that BMW than BMW of Manhattan. You see, when you buy or lease from us, you also become a member of BMW of Manhattan's exclusive C.E.O. Club, which entitles you to all kinds of benefits and discounts.
So come in to BMW of Manhattan for more details on these special programs. This offer expires May 31, 1993.

HOW DO YOU IMPROVE THE VALUE OF CARS THAT WERE JUST RATED THE BEST OVERALL VALUES?

$329 LEASE PER MONTH FOR 36 MOS.

With capitalized cost reduction of $1,878.*

The Volvo 240 Wagon is the best overall value of any subcompact/compact wagon over $15,000.†
The 1993 Complete Car Cost Guide

$409 LEASE PER MONTH FOR 36 MOS.

With capitalized cost reduction of $1,939.*

The 1993 Complete Car Cost Guide

Easy. By offering extraordinary lease terms on any new 1993 200 and 900 series Volvo. Low APR financing and free factory-scheduled maintenance are also available.*

FREE MAINTENANCE* FACTORY-SCHEDULED

Of course, safety features like anti-lock brakes, a driver's side supplemental restraint system which includes an air bag, reinforced steel passenger cages, and energy-absorbing structures, add a value to driving a Volvo you can't put a dollar amount on.

And how do you improve on all this? It would be tough.

Drive safely.

VOLVO

THE VOLVO BEST VALUE PROGRAM.

Now through May 31. See your participating Volvo dealer.

†©1993 IntelliChoice, Inc., San Jose, CA. Ratings based on purchase price and cost of ownership over five years, including depreciation, insurance, financing, state fees, fuel, repairs and maintenance. *Offered by Volvo Car Finance, Inc. through participating Volvo dealers through May 31, 1993. Subject to credit approval and availability from existing dealer inventory. Customers must take delivery by June 7, 1993. Dealer prices may vary. Capitalized Cost Reductions may be comprised of dealer and/or customer contributions, as well as trade-in allowances. Dealer contribution may affect customer cost. Payments based on either a 36 or 48-month closed-end lease for new 1993 200 Series or 900 Series models. 36-month examples: A 245A wagon would require 36 payments of $329 a month, totalling $11,844. A 945 Turbo wagon with Level 2 option package and leather interior would require 36 payments of $409 a month, totalling $14,724. Different options and/or term may affect monthly payments. BASED ON A CUSTOMER CAPITALIZED COST REDUCTION OF $1,878 FOR THE 245A OR $1,939 FOR THE 945 TURBO. Customer responsible at signing for the capitalized cost reduction, first monthly payment, $450 Acquisition Fee, refundable security deposit of $350 (for the 245A) or $425 (for the 945 Turbo) totalling $3,007 for the 245A or $3,223 for the 945 Turbo, plus insurance, taxes, destination charge, title and registration fees. Customer liable throughout the lease for maintenance and repairs not included in the free maintenance offer. If customer does not purchase the vehicle at lease end, customer responsible for mileage charge of $.15/mile over 15,000 miles per year, excess wear and tear, and a $250 disposition fee. Option to purchase at lease end for $11,950 for the 245A and $15,025 for the 945 Turbo, plus any official fees and taxes. Free factory-scheduled maintenance available for 3 years or 50,000 miles, whichever comes first. See your authorized Volvo dealer for details of both the finance and lease programs. ©1993 Volvo Car Finance, Inc. Drive Safely is a trademark of Volvo Cars of North America, Inc.

Think of the questions you ask every day. Then think of the car with the answers important to you:

The Cadillac DeVille.

The Reassuring Answers.

"Out of gas! What do we do now?"

"It tells you how much confidence they have in a product, doesn't it?"

"Doesn't it make you feel better when you drive out of town?"

"Is this a good time to buy?"

"Anything else I should know?"

The DeVille is backed by unsurpassed Cadillac Owner Privileges,,, which include free Roadside Service if you run out of gas, have a flat tire or lock your keys in your car.*

Like every Cadillac, DeVille's no-deductible bumper to bumper warranty is among the finest in the industry.

Cadillac Owner Privileges include trip-interruption protection and complimentary trip routing.*

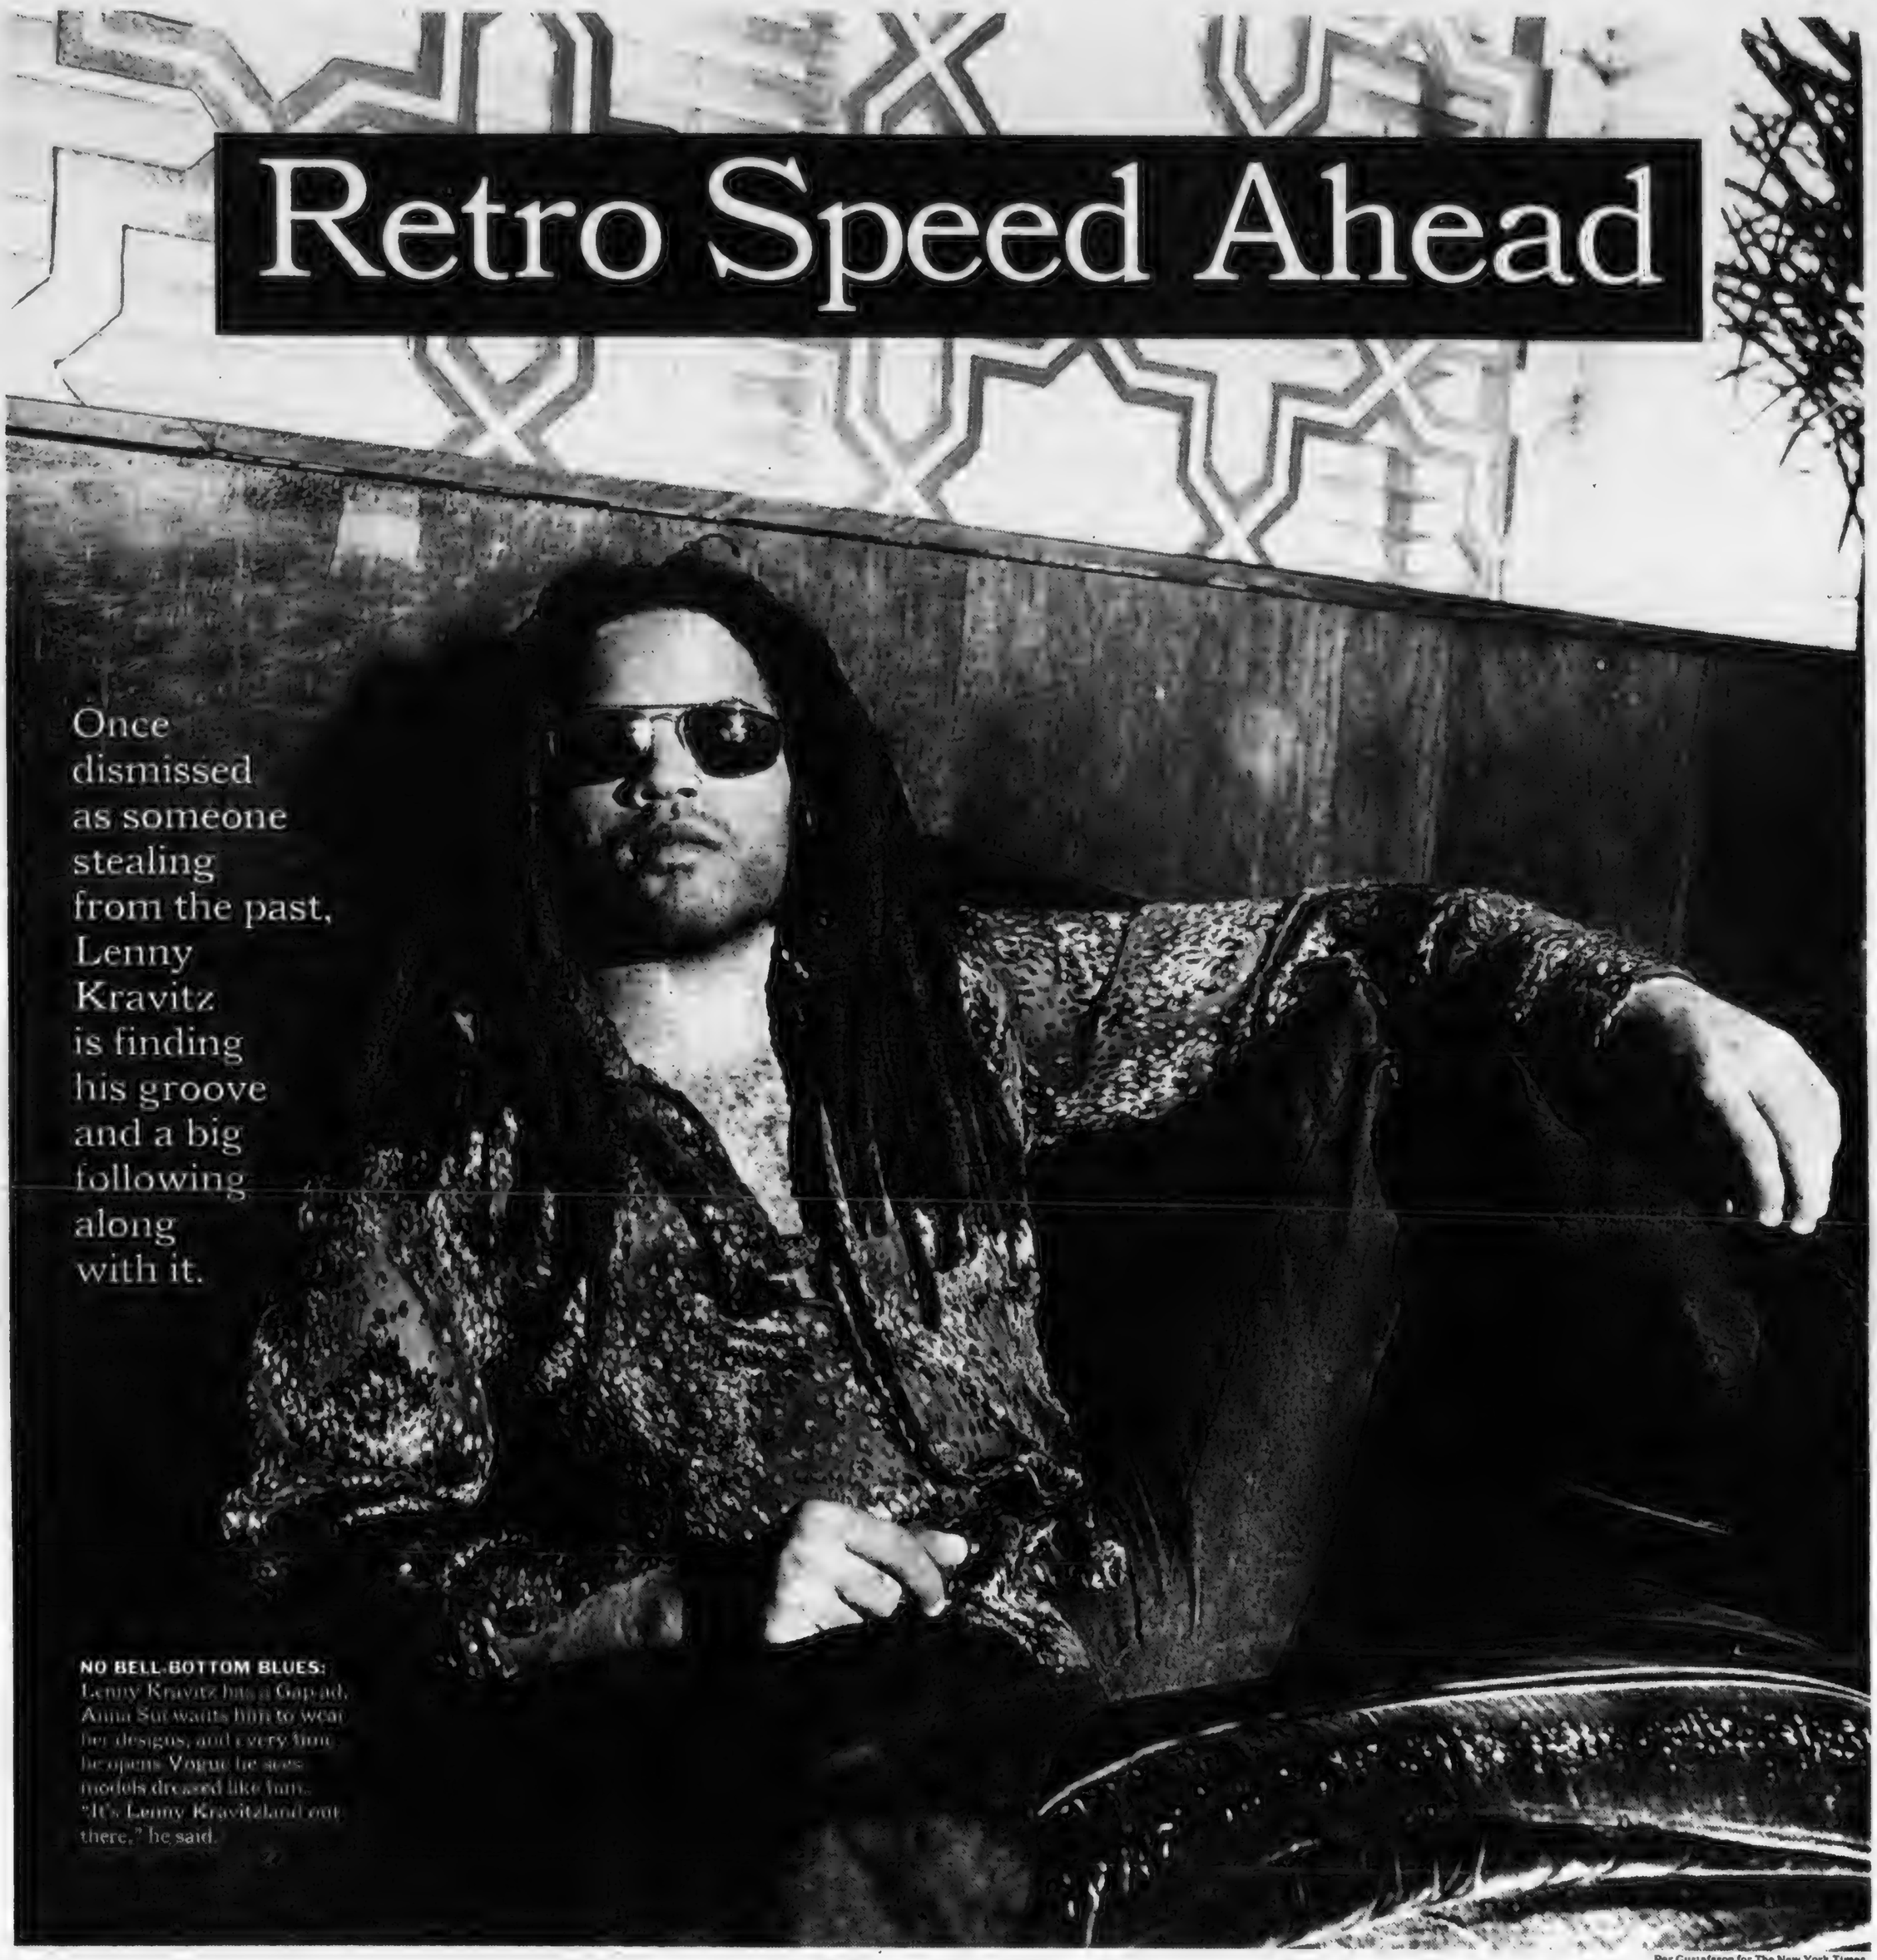
Retro Speed Ahead



Once dismissed as someone stealing from the past, Lenny Kravitz is finding his groove and a big following along with it.

NO BELL-BOTTOM BLUES: Lenny Kravitz has a Gap ad, Anna Sui wants him to wear her designs, and every time he opens Vogue he sees models dressed like him. "It's Lenny Kravitzland out there," he said.

Per Gustafsson for The New York Times

By RICK MARIN

LENNY KRAVITZ stepped out of a limo onto Lafayette Street wearing hip-hugging flared blue jeans, black suede platform boots, a brownish see-through shirt open to the midriff, several rings in his ears (and one through his nose), a big turquoise necklace and a black pin-striped blazer with shoulder-width lapels.

And these are his day clothes.

People used to laugh at Lenny Kravitz. They laughed at his "dreadlocked ring-through-the-nose hipster" look and "60's love guru" image. They laughed at his hippie music and dippy lyrics. So who's laughing now?

Not the Gap, which has just anointed Mr. Kravitz with an ad. Not the club kids on MTV's dance show "The Grind," who go crazy over him. Not the designer Anna Sui, who wants him to wear her thrift-shop couture, or Details magazine, which recently crowned him creator of "the rock/soul groove of the 90's."

Mr. Kravitz is a sampler — of wardrobes, music, everything. Throwback that he appears to be, he's also a product of his time. From hip-hop to grunge to Nick at Nite, sampling has become the defining cultural activity of his generation. But while rappers sample to establish their supremacy over the past, Mr. Kravitz seems to want to live there.

Striding into the Time Cafe in Manhattan on a brilliantly sunny Saturday, Mr. Kravitz was gazed upon like a prodigal son by brunching downtowners, many of them dressed like the cast of "Tommy." Fashionably chokered necks craned for a glimpse of this groovy guru as the bell-bottomed hostess ushered him to a prime corner booth.

Clearly, the curve has caught up with Lenny Kravitz.

His third album, "Are You Gonna Go My Way," is No. 12 on the Billboard chart for the week ending May 1. The video for the title track is a frenzied, orgiastic performance exhuming (if not reincarnating) the spirit of Jimi Hendrix, complete with phase-shifter guitar and sexily slurred lyrics. It's a retro spectacle that begs the question always begged of Mr. Kravitz: Is this some kind of homage or just a slick rip-off? And does it matter?

Purists despise him as a looter of rock's hallowed tomb, a Day-Glo poseur. "Plenty of people dump on Lenny Kravitz, and who can blame them?" cracked an article in a recent issue of Entertainment Weekly.

Then along comes Rolling Stone, the ultimate arbiter of rock authenticity, with a three-star review that allows that maybe he's not so bad after all.

Which may explain why this embattled 28-year-old, half-black, half-Jewish pop anomaly is giving up his apartment in SoHo and moving to the Bahamian island of Eleuthera as soon as he finishes a world tour that began Friday in Japan. "I'm looking for a little bit of

Dress Code Decoded

Photographs by BILL CUNNINGHAM for The New York Times

"Don't mess with our skirt lengths" appeared to be the overwhelming fashion message from the 1,200 women — executives, corporate wives and society leaders — who attended the Central Park Conservancy's Frederick Law Olmsted Awards Luncheon last Wednesday at the luxuriant Conservatory Garden, Fifth Avenue and 104th Street.

"This event has replaced the Easter Parade," one guest said.

Fewer than a dozen below-the-knee skirts were seen, and pantsuits as an alternative fared only slightly better. These designer customers have rejected the radical swings of fashion for the tried-and-true classic suits that have dominated the society scene for the last 20 years, leaving avant-garde fashion experiments to those below 23d Street.

Now the pressing question north of 23d Street is: Who will replace Adolfo? The designer, who recast the Chanel suit in knitwear, announced in March that he was closing his salon.

Looking for Love (Shh!) in Ads

Although Islamic fundamentalists disapprove, personals are flourishing in Algeria.

CONSTANTINE, Algeria — Samia Mohammed, like many of the high school students she teaches, dreams of someone special.

"He doesn't have to be handsome," she said, "but it would be nice. I do want him to be educated, and to be kind."

But conditions in Algeria often seem to conspire against love. There's the nightly curfew in the capital city of Algiers and outlying districts that sends many Algerians scurrying home early. There's the severe housing shortage that defeats the efforts of even the most diligent couples. And there's the growing Islamic influence that makes it harder for lovers to neck at the movies, go to the beach or even sit together on a park bench.

All of it combines to create a nation of lonely hearts.

But for thousands, there is a final refuge: personal advertisements in newspapers.

Chris Hedges/The New York Times

In Algeria, personals are a refuge. Najda Zaiter, an editor at Algeria East, decides which ones are fit to print.

Take, for example, Massoud, whom young women can reach by writing to No. 869 at the offices of Algeria East, the Arabic-language paper in Constantine. He is "27 years old, dark, out of work and would like a woman between the ages of 20 and 30 who has a job and an apartment."

Or Houria, a 36-year-old woman who describes herself as having "the ideal character, average looks and my own apartment." She wants a "religious man who is polite and respectable."

Personal ads rarely raise eyebrows in liberal Western societies, but they remain taboo in most of the Arab world — except for Algeria and a handful of other countries. First instituted in Algeria in 1989 with the country's democratic opening, personal ads have survived the pervasive censorship imposed since the military coup 16 months ago. But as gun battles between Islamic militants and police have increased, forcing many to stay close to home, as political life has been shut down and as unemployment has climbed to 50 percent among the young, newspapers have been flooded with bags of mail from those searching for a way out.

"We live with political and social uncertainty," said Yasser Ben Miloud, a 24-year-old musician. "We are caught between the military Government and the Islamic fundamentalists. The censorship, the curfew, the violence and the emergency laws have ended our public life. It is difficult to travel abroad, because few countries give us visas and our currency can't be converted. The search for love is one of the few ways we have left to express ourselves."

Najda Zaiter, an editor at Algeria East, sat in front of a stack of mail. Each day 30 to 40 letters arrive at the paper. She assigns each writer a number, which is used in the paper instead of the name. Those who respond to the ads write to the paper, giving the number of the person they are interested in meeting, and the letter is forwarded.

Those looking for someone who would be willing to sneak off to the coast for a weekend, who specify the body measurements they desire or who otherwise don't appear to be looking for a serious relationship do not have their letters printed.

But even after tossing out the letters she considers too lurid, Miss Zaiter has doubts about how much romance some of her readers want. "I get a lot of letters from 17- and 18-year-old boys who say they don't care how old a woman is, what she looks like or what her educational level is, as long as she has a place to live," Miss Zaiter said. "And I notice that when a woman announces that she has her own apartment, she gets a lot of responses, even from much younger men."

But while the personal columns in some of the larger Algerian papers attract up to 200 letters a day, those who place ads rarely tell friends or family what they have done.

"Many people, and especially women, don't want responses mailed to their homes," Miss Zaiter said. "We are requested to send the letters to the house of a friend, or where they work. And if a relationship is formed, the couple will usually invent a story about how they met. It just isn't accepted in a traditional society that people get together like this."

Miss Mohammed, for example, who admits to reading through the ads every morning before darting off to school, said she had never answered one.

"I met my current boyfriend after dialing a wrong number and beginning a conversation," the 32-year-old teacher said. "And while it is difficult for a single woman to meet a man, I just couldn't go so far as to write a stranger. But I guess a lot of people do."

That the service works is undeniable. Postcards, flowers, small presents and even pieces of wedding cake arrive at newspapers from couples who have met through the columns. And newspaper editors said that the personal ads, which usually take up one or two pages, increase circulation. None of the newspapers charge fees for the service.

"The ads cut across class lines, from the nearly illiterate, to university professors," said Guittone Nourdine, the managing editor of the national newspaper L'Opinion, based in Algiers. "They are one of our major draws."

The columns have also proved beneficial to some who previously have had trouble finding a partner. Papers are filled with ads from divorced or widowed men who have children and would like to marry infertile women. "A few years ago, if a woman couldn't have children, she had trouble holding on to a marriage," said Hafida Oubasson, the editor in charge of personal ads at Mag 7, a national newspaper also based in Algiers that receives more than 100 letters a day. "Now infertile women are in high demand."

Associations for handicapped people said the service has helped people with disabilities. Elderly people write in looking for partners. And the ads make it possible for people from various cities and regions to make contact. Still, not everyone can place an ad: the Arab world's taboo on homosexuality is enforced.

Though Islamic fundamentalists disapprove, there are many ardent followers of the personal ads, and some of the most enthusiastic ones come from the one million Algerian emigrants in France.

"When it comes time for male emigrants to marry, they don't want a woman who has been corrupted by European society, but a traditional Muslim girl," said Zouhir Mebarki, the editor in chief of Mag 7. "And all they have to do is write in asking for one."

SURFACING

LOOKS

The male waif: Just as delicate models like Kate Moss replaced statuesque goddesses as this season's standard of beauty, so too have fragile hunks like the actor Johnny Depp begun to supplant the likes of Marky Mark as icons of maleness.

MARKETING

African-American perfume: A French company hired a black-owned advertising firm from Los Angeles to develop the name, logo and marketing for a line of fragrances for African-Americans. The result? Azende! (named after the Azande tribe, which once ruled the Congo area).

STATEMENTS

Fake nose rings: For ersatz rebels and weekend anarchists. Unlike the real thing, these sterling-silver rings are painless to install. They're $6 at Liliana's Boutique in Manhattan.

Live or in Living Color?

Chris Rock, a featured comedian on NBC's "Saturday Night Live," may be leaving for the rival Fox comedy show "In Living Color," said a person involved in the negotiations.

Mr. Rock, who also starred in the film "CB4," is said to feel underutilized on "Saturday Night Live."

"In Living Color" is trying to shore up its talent roster in the wake of the recent departure of the show's creator, Keenen Ivory Wayans, and Mr. Wayans's siblings, Damon, Kim and Marlon. Publicists for both shows and for Mr. Rock had no comment.

The Unwitting Star Of Clashing Values I and II

Kathie Lee Gifford has finally met some publicity she doesn't like. Two weeks ago, Mrs. Gifford, the co-host of "Regis and Kathie Lee," tried to disassociate herself from an interview she had given to Maternity Fashion & Beauty magazine, after learning that it is owned by Larry Flynt, the publisher of Hustler. "It would go against my values," she said, "to associate myself with a publisher who produces magazines that are offensive to me." She also tried but failed to get out of an agreement to appear on the magazine's cover.

How then does Mrs. Gifford explain her appearance on the cover of the May issue of Longevity, owned by Bob Guccione, publisher of Penthouse?

"Longevity magazine itself," she said by fax, "is an established publication that performs a useful service for men and women, and I initially granted the interview on that basis. By the time I realized who the publisher was, the magazine had passed its deadline."

Maternity Fashion & Beauty's article, for the fall issue, will feature Mrs. Gifford's line of maternity wear. "We think Kathie Lee is a wonderful role model," said Linda Arroz, the editor in chief. "Who owns this magazine is irrelevant."

Sex Talk on the Radio With Dr. Judy

NAME: Dr. Judy Kuriansky.

IDENTITY: The next Dr. Ruth Westheimer; co-host, with Chris Jagger, of Lovephones, a six-month-old call-in show about sex, on WHTZ-FM (a k a Z-100), Monday through Thursday from 10 P.M. to midnight (with guests — "honorary love doctors" — like Sandra Bernhard and Arrested Development). Married to Edward Kuriansky, a New York State Deputy Attorney General.

CREDENTIALS: Ph.D. in clinical psychology from New York University, where she is a visiting professor.

Q. What do people call about?

A. A lot of people call me about things that they see other people doing. A guy called in who had walked in on his mother having sex with her best girlfriend. I always encourage them to confront the person about what they saw.

Q. A lot of people also call up talking about partners who want them to do something they might not want to.

A. Sometimes it's inhibitions they need to get over. Other times they have to be able to say no and feel good about it. Young girls particularly will be hesitant to say something because they don't want to lose the guy. They say things like "Oh, he's so cute." My answer would be something like, "Well, put a bag over his head and see if you'd react the same way."

Q. How old are the callers?

A. Mainly from 16 to 26. What blows my mind is that there are so many myths young people have. You wonder why hasn't the sexual revolution answered some of these questions. The myths about pregnancy are paramount.

Q. Who did you first talk about sex with?

A. My mother. I remember when I was a kid, she gave me a couple of books about menstruation. But we didn't talk about sex that much.

Q. Some people must think all this talk about sex contributes to breaking down morals. What moral questions concern you?

A. I get very upset about the things that people do that transgress their own sense of dignity and honor and also others'. For example, there are many calls from people who know they are doing something that has hurt themselves or others, and they start out with a sense of bravado, but I know they feel guilty. Like the kid who slept with his girlfriend's mother. He has basically ruined his girlfriend's life forever if she finds out about it.

Q. But do you tell people what they do is sometimes wrong?

A. The way I like to phrase it, "How do you feel about what you do?" Usually they come around to saying "I don't like it. I'm not happy I did it."

Q. Do you talk about your own experience?

A. I try not to. Rather than preaching to them about the way it should be, I believe — and it's part of my psychiatric training anyway — that you say: "What do you think? What do you want to do?"

Q. People must ask you personal questions.

A. Somebody asked me the other day what my favorite position is.

Q. Did you answer it?

A. No.

Q. If you were to call Dr. Kuriansky tomorrow, what would you ask about?

A. Umm . . . The answer is not coming to my mind right away. I don't have any sexual problems because I've talked about it so much and I've thought about it so much.

NOTES

A Larry Gatlin fan club composed entirely of celebrities materialized at the annual Manhattan Theater Club gala on Monday. Lynn Redgrave, a host, was the first to proclaim her lust for Mr. Gatlin (below right), the current star of "The Will Rogers Follies."

"I'm not taking hormones, I've had no plastic surgery, and I want Larry Gatlin," she said. Later, Stephen Collins, a star of the Manhattan Theater Club's play "Putting It Together," said in jest: "I have a confession to make. I want Larry Gatlin. There goes the career in the military."

Mr. Gatlin said, "My God, it is New York. But without casting aspersions on anyone, I'll take Lynn Redgrave." He added that he'd been feeling overshadowed by Marla Maples, whose final performance in "Follies" was last Sunday. "She has done a very fine job," he said, "but there is going to be life after Marla."

At the opening of "Angels in America" on Tuesday, Ron Leibman, who portrays a particularly villainous Roy Cohn in the play, said that people who knew the lawyer find his performance eerie: "The Shuberts knew him and did business with him, and they said, 'It's very scary what you're doing.' "

"Dear Susan:

"Thank you so much for your generosity with my article. It's been a pleasure doing business with you.

"By the way, however thrilled my hairdresser, Paul LeBlanc, was, my lovely makeup artist of three pictures, Tricia Sawyer, and my personal trainer, Lisa Cloud, were equally disappointed not to be mentioned by name.

"If you could in any way print a blurb concerning Miss Sawyer's and Miss Cloud's employment with me, and my extremely high professional regard for them both, it would be greatly appreciated.

Love Ballet, Love to Dance

The gala inaugurating an eight-week tribute to Balanchine that will feature 73 of his ballets, at the New York State Theater.

Photographs by BILL CUNNINGHAM for The New York Times

ABOVE May 4, 11:50 P.M.: Toward the end of the gala for the Balanchine Celebration at the New York State Theater, some of the 1,200 guests formed a conga line, including, from left, TOM GOLD, MISOON WHANG and ALBERT EVANS. The party was so large that tents for extra tables were set up on the terrace.

RIGHT May 5, 12:10 A.M.: ANNE H. BASS, the co-chairwoman of the gala, takes a twirl on the promenade.

LEFT May 4, 11:40 P.M.: The decorative focal point of the dessert trays is a sugar Fabergé-style egg by Glorious Food, caterers. Being served are LEE and HERBERT ROSS.

Bigger And Better

A preview of the restored and expanded Jewish Museum, May 3.

ABOVE 8:10 P.M.: Guests at the private preview party tour the Jewish Museum and its new wing. The museum is in the former Felix M. Warburg mansion, built in 1908, at Fifth Avenue and East 92d Street. The wing, designed by Kevin Roche, echoes the mansion's Renaissance style. LESTA SUMMERFIELD STACOM, the hostess, and MORRIS OFFIT, the president of the museum's board of trustees, gesture toward architectural details. The gala opening will be on June 7.

THE NIGHT

Bob Morris

On the Radio, Weee-ooo

On Long Island, wanting to air what the locals ought to like . . . In Manhattan, airing what you know some don't want to hear . . . And getting stuck on hair goo.

Hobnobbing with Billy Joel, Mickey Schulhof and other voices of the Hamptons.

IF you had been strolling on a recent Saturday night on Main Street in East Hampton, L.I. — past the movie theater, where a screening of Columbia Pictures' "Lost in Yonkers" was in progress; past Bookhampton, where people were browsing with the determination of war generals; past the windmill that adds a small-town charm — you would have come upon a little white building housing a new radio station owned by big-timers who like to play small-towners.

Behind a storefront window and a pink neon sign that said "WEHM 96.7 FM," a disk jockey was airing a commercial for "Lost in Yonkers" in a spanking-new on-air studio. Then he played a song by Billy Joel, who lives a few miles away, in Amagansett.

People driving along the serenely pre-season lanes of the village listening to the station might not have known that Billy Joel is an owner of WEHM. They might not have known that Michael Schulhof, who is the vice chairman of Sony U.S.A., is also an owner of the station, which promotes itself as "truly local" and "community minded."

"We put the studio right on Main Street so that local people who walk by feel that it's their station," Mr. Schulhof said later, at a post-screening party at the Restaurant at East Hampton Point, the second eatery in town opened by the international advertising guru and local bald man, Jerry Della Femina. After working the global village all week, it must be fun to tinker with a real one.

The party — bumper to bumper with weekend townsfolk like Ronald Perelman, Jann Wenner, Martha Stewart, Leonard Stern — was given by WEHM and Columbia Pictures (which just happens to be owned by Sony).

"It really is the voice of the Hamptons," Mr. Della Femina said to Mr. Schulhof (everyone calls him Mickey) with a pat on the back, one townie to another.

Nearby, another voice of the Hamptons was drinking wine. "I'm a radio guy," Billy Joel was saying. "I grew up on Long Island during the 60's, the wonderful years of FM radio, listening to WNEW, WLIR, WBAI or some other farchadat station that played alternative music. FM used to be a great place to introduce new stuff. When I first started to tour, we'd go to local stations, and the program directors would change their schedules to make room for us. You sure can't do that on MTV. Music used to be an art form, not just a business."

"I wanted to program more alternative and college rock," he said, referring to the "adult contemporary light" music played on WEHM and on most other stations you can hear on the East End. "When I suggested that at a board meeting, everybody just

Who Likes to Hear Broken English?

J Smooth is just like his name.

Last Tuesday night at 10 o'clock, the laid-back 20-year-old host of a weekly hip-hop show on WBAI 99.5 FM, was inside a funky on-air studio near Penn Station. "My name is J Smooth and I am the composer, arranger and conductor of the Underground Railroad," he said gently into the microphone. "Those of you who are offended by youth expressing themselves or by broken English may want to turn the dial at this time." His co-producer, Agu Obiakov, a student at City College, shook some keys into another microphone on the word "broken."

Then, before Freestyle Fellowship, a Los Angeles group recently signed by Island Records, arrived for an on-air visit, the two of them set about spinning records, CD's, cassettes and reel-to-reel tapes, mixing the voices of friends talking about racism with recordings by Miles Davis, Donald Byrd, Doctor Dre and other musicians and writers. Listening to them was like taking a walk through the mind of a very cool adolescent.

J Smooth, whose real name is John Randolph, works as a social worker during the day at a group home for troubled teen-agers in Westchester County. He has declined job offers at record companies. On his show, he encourages his listeners to read. Sometimes they write to tell him he keeps them in a positive mood. He finds that flattering.

Among the snapshots he carries around is one of him at a turntable with a friend's child on his lap. "I was teaching him how to scratch," he said while stroking the beginnings of a beard. "It's hard to imagine being born into a world where hip-hop is already a billion-dollar industry."

That Green Hair Stuff

It was almost midnight on Tuesday, and, not far from WBAI, sequestered in an antiseptic empire of offices and studios above the city, Jay Diamond, the WABC-AM Talk Radio host, was looking a little annoyed with the quality of calls coming in. It was his own fault, having raised the topic of hair and the green hair product he'd used as a child in the 1960's. He couldn't recall the product's name, and now his faithful listeners were offering suggestions. Pomade? Crewcut? Polymold?

In an adjacent state-of-the-art control room run by an engineer, a bleary-eyed assistant was fielding the phones and entering data into a computer. Names appeared on a monitor over Mr. Diamond's head. Tony from Manhattan wanted to talk about Bosnia. Lydia from Brooklyn wanted to talk about the Board of Education elections. John from the Bronx, about evolution. The callers were lined up like planes at La Guardia, and lights were blinking on Mr. Diamond's telephone. A sort of air traffic controller for the public expression of ideology, he was perspiring a little above the lip as he worked each call.

"That green stuff was called Dippity-Do," a well-meaning woman from Bensonhurst told him.

"No, it's not Dippity-Do," Mr. Diamond, who is 40 and a member of the Queens-based Family Defense Council and has something to say about everything, shot back.

"Now about those guys with long hair," she

> 'That green stuff was called Dippity-Do,' she said. 'No, it's not Dippity-Do,' he said.

continued. "When I was a kid in school, our teacher came up with the statistics that proved that more guys with long hair became gangsters, and to this day, when I see a guy with long hair it scares the wits out of me."

He listened to her while scanning newspapers and glancing at ideas he'd scribbled on his stationery. "I know what you mean," he said. "There is a disorder to it that is aggressive. There is a feral quality that people with long hair want to convey." The word feral silenced her, and he said goodnight, taking off his headset for a commercial break.

"The characters change so frequently in a night," he said, rubbing his eyes with a small, pale hand. "Sometimes you can be stunned at the quality of the people who call. I've had lawyers call me up at 2 o'clock in the morning to argue some arcane points of the law and doctors explain the relationship between blood pressure and the kidneys. I think people call because it's satisfying for them to know in the middle of the night there's a guy in an office building in Manhattan whose pulse is racing and whose face is occasionally flushed and he's actually listening to them."

Later, looking remorseful for cutting several annoying callers off with the touch of a button, he theorized on whether the "satanic" quality of rock-and-roll is a product of contemporary culture or vice versa, and he declared that it was his longstanding belief that all sex should be in the closet.

"I'm not in the position to tell anybody else how to live," he said to tens of thousands of listeners in New York, New Jersey, Connecticut and beyond. "I barely get by a day on my own."

Reality Dawns

With a squeak instead of a roar, the first female condom is about to arrive, a new symbol of what the sexual revolution has wrought: Women may gain a bit more freedom, but as always, there is a price.

GALLOWS humor is the act of laughing about things that are not funny. The female condom, which is about to be approved by the Food and Drug Administration for use in America, is bound to produce a veritable glut of gallows humor.

The condom, in development since 1987, is a byproduct of the wages of unprotected sex, which has produced, the World Health Organization notes, a million new cases of H.I.V. worldwide since mid-1992. A second, if less dire, consequence is that 56 percent of all pregnancies are unintended, and that teenagers have 66 percent of these unintended pregnancies. Male condoms offer no guarantee; they can have a failure rate as high as a 15 percent, so you could argue that one useful name for couples who rely on them is parents.

In any case, those who don't fret about condoms breaking may worry that they break the mood, which they certainly do, in profound and troublesome ways. First, there is the unavoidable disruption of applying them, though it may be that people are well advised to refrain from sexual encounters whose magic and charm are so fragile and evanescent that they can be dispelled by applying a condom. Then, too, at the start of a liaison, when condoms are the handiest protection, most prefer to see themselves and their new partner as virginal and pristine, a tender illusion that falters when lovers feel bound to protect themselves against herpes or syphyllis or AIDS.

Because it appears that women have more to fear from men than men have to fear from women, it follows that the partner with more to lose would be more vigilant about protection. Which brings us to the female condom, the charmingly named Reality Vaginal Pouch, a moniker certain to delight any woman who harbors the secret wish that she had been born a marsupial.

The female condom is not pretty: it looks like what you would get by crossing a test tube and the thumb of a transparent rubber glove. It is described by its manufacturer, the Wisconsin Pharmacal Company, as "a soft loose-fitting polyurethane sheath and two flexible polyurethane rings." One ring anchors the device at the sheath's closed end. The other forms the external edge of the sheath and dangles from the vagina, an unexpected bit of polyurethane in an oval shape reminiscent of the gaping mouth in that Edvard Munch painting "The Scream."

Clearly, there is such a thing as too much Reality. And even the determinedly upbeat promotional literature notes that the Reality is not for women who, as it so delicately puts it, "do not like having anything hang outside the vagina" — which must constitute quite a crowd. The ring, the manufacturer allows, appears "cumbersome at first." It is left to the strong-hearted to imagine the mises en scène that transport you from "at first" to "at last."

> Women have a condom of their own, and it just may be the death knell of chivalry.

The Reality is not merely gross and unsightly. It also squeaks. Couples who have used it describe certain noises that could lead you to think there is a third party in bed, if, that is, you are the sort of person who would call a mouse a third party.

Still the prospective comedy of manners over who wears the condom may provide the final testing ground of chivalry and its merits, demonstrating once and for all that chivalry has no relevance in an age when a man has to wonder whether it will insult a woman if he opens a door for her.

On a more practical note, the Reality has a failure rate of 2.8 percent, the company says, and a one-time use, and at $2.25, it is three times the price of a male condom. Stronger than other condoms, it is thinner as well, enabling it to conduct heat more effectively. And in a pun you may assume to be wholly unintended, this contraceptive for women is touted by its maker as providing "broad coverage."

Yet, curiously, while the Reality is pretty much the exact opposite of the chastity belt, it might well produce the same result. Which begs the question of whether this bold leap forward in concept and design is a case of whither progress or of progress withers.

Like all realities, this Reality has its price, simultaneously constituting a gigantic step forward and an equally large step back. Forward, because the Reality reduces a woman's potential reliance on the kindness of strangers and other men who may not have her best interests at heart. Backward, because the deepest promise of feminism was that it would reduce the divide between the way women seem and the way they are. By this standard, a woman who seemed sensual would also feel sensual. But feeling sensual while wearing the Reality seems to call for a degree of disconnection so extreme as to place a woman in a state that might appeal to men with a weakness for women on Thorazine.

The year of the woman was touted as a great progressive boon in a society that has never had the dimmest necessity for decreeing the year of the man. And how quickly the year of the woman devolved into the year of the waif, in which the much-vaunted appeal of Kate Moss and other over-used models was based on their knack for appearing to be both under-age and stunned on the head by something heavy.

The fact is, the more women mature, and the more mature women there are, the more we hear about Joey and Woody and all the other ostensible adults who feel safest with little girls. Little girls are malleable and dependent. The mature woman takes care of herself. And thanks to the Reality, you will always be able to recognize her — in certain circumstances, at least — because she is the one dangling that cute little ring. Such is the price of independence.

Wisconsin Pharmacal Company

The Reality female condom: rubbery, soft and thin, it also squeaks.

To be fair, one of the Reality's advantages is that it has been made relatively easy to insert. In the instructions (complete with drawings), Part 4 reads simply, "Reality in place," a phrase whose evident intent suggests that the maker of this condom is given less to irony than to nuance.

AND in the larger sense, just what realities are in place? One is that women can't trust men to be truthful about their sexual histories, or recent encounters. Some men are wont to flatter the woman they try to seduce by insisting that they have had no recent encounters. In other words, the call for complete disclosure in a licentious age has set men to telling the kind of lies they have not had to tell since lying to their parents in high school.

But the most significant reality is that women, when all is said and done, are more practical and less romantic than men. And when it comes to tasks from contraception to taking out the garbage, women willingly assume the burden for men who are often too flustered or selfish to be bothered.

For all these reasons, producing a female condom was reality-based indeed, and the ultimate emblem of freedom. But did it have to be a polyurethane emblem that looks like a contraption used to punish fallen virgins in the Dark Ages?

I don't know about you, but to me, those nascent days of the so-called sexual revolution that once seemed so profligate and bawdy, seem quaint and innocent now. There was no fear of disease. You didn't have to get pregnant. There was only the psychic damage that you were certain you were hip enough to avoid.

I suppose they were wild times. Yet, memory casts them as oddly touching. It is always touching to recall a time that is innocent in the genuine sense, that is, a time when it was possible to enjoy the delusion that there would be no price to pay.

But these days, when old values are up for scrutiny (or up for sale), the need for the female condom demonstrates that the Biblical equation of sex and death has been recycled into one of the salient concerns of the late 20th century. And beyond any esthetic revulsion, distaste for the female condom reveals a deep and aching nostalgia for a life whose fundementals include the ability to equate passion with abandon, trust with love.

Nonetheless, the news engendered by the Reality condom is both good and bad. Women can be sexy and free; they can be relatively safe from disease. That is the good news. The bad news is that they can be just one of these things at a time.

Batman the Ride

The inverted roller coaster is not for the faint of heart. It is state of the art, but who knows for how long.

Bill LaForce for The New York Times

WHAT: The inverted roller coaster, officially known in these parts as Batman the Ride. With their legs dangling, passengers sit in plastic chairs suspended under a monorail. Imagine a ski lift that flips riders upside down at 50 miles per hour.

WHERE: The Movietown section of the Six Flags Great Adventure amusement park in Jackson, N.J., about 60 miles from New York and Philadelphia. (Only two other inverted roller coasters exist — another Batman the Ride at the Six Flags Great America in Gurnee, Ill., and one called Topgun at the Paramount Great America in Santa Clara, Calif.)

WHY? Baby boomers and their boomlet babies demand more out of a roller coaster than just slow, cranky ascents and sharp drops. (Already, Great Adventure's Great American Scream Machine, the state of the art in roller coasters in 1989, has become passé.)

WHY ELSE? "Themed" amusement parks are hot. Bob Pittman, the founder of MTV, was a major force in "theming" the Six Flags Great Adventure park to Time Warner products.

WHY BATMAN? A Disneylike marketing tie-in. Great Adventure is owned by Time Warner Inc. Time Warner makes movies. Time Warner also employs Mr. Pittman and now owns MTV. (Even the old Great Adventure pizzeria has been redesigned and renamed. It's now the HBO backlot commissary. HBO is owned by Time Warner.)

MORE BATMANIA: The ride, which was built by the Swiss company Bolliger & Mabillard, towers over a replica of Gotham City. When approaching the ride, passengers walk through Gotham Park and listen to the Batman soundtrack by Prince (a Time Warner artist). Ride attendants are dressed like Alfred the butler. Adding a little Bat Cave eeriness, colored lights flash and smoke from liquid nitrogen wafts up from the floor.

STATS: Track length: 2,693 feet. Height: 105 feet. Tallest loop: 77 feet. Ride length: 2 minutes. Weekend wait: about an hour. Cost: $29.68 for one adult park-admission ticket good for all rides; for a child's ticket, $20.14. Number of times you are upside down: five — two vertical outside loops, two outside corkscrews and a simulated zero-gravity roll.

SENSATION: Like being in a plane that's about to crash.

WHAT IF? An over-the-shoulders plastic brace keeps the body snugly in place. A seat belt between the legs serves as a backup.

TESTIMONIAL: "My heart just dropped — I never felt something so great," said Valerie Matteucci, 18, of Old Bridge, N.J., one of the first passengers on the ride, which opened on May 1.

PROFESSIONAL OPINION: "It's probably the most perfectly paced, perfectly designed roller coaster ever to be built," said Steve Urbanowicz of Jersey City, a regional representative of American Coaster Enthusiasts, a 4,000-member organization.

CAVEATS: No pregnant passengers. No riders with heart conditions. No change in your pocket. No loose shoes. No riders under 4 feet 6 inches tall, even if accompanied by adults.

CHICKENS: Gerald Kolpan. He's a reporter with WTXF-TV in Philadelphia. He was the only person among a group of about 140 reporters on a recent visit to refuse to take a ride on Batman. "It would take an act of Congress to get me on that thing," he said.

Rave at Close of Day? You Betcha

The youth event of the late 80's has reached Long Island, in a somewhat compromised version.

By BETSY ISRAEL

DEER PARK, L.I. — It's 10 P.M. at a Deer Park 7-Eleven, and the rave boys wander in for supplies: five jars of Vicks Vaporub, three asthma inhalers and what seems like the entire contents of the Hostess cupcake stand. Bundled inside Day-Glo raincoats and dangling sock hats, they might be fast-food bandits on a sugar high, turnpike kids who rented "A Clockwork Orange" and have frightened the neighbors ever since.

What they are is the latest group of Long Island boys to play dress-up. Back in the 1970's and 80's, many like them — out of high school, not quite in college — put on fishnet tights and drove to see "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" in deepest Uniondale. Now, local boys head for Deer Park, in Suffolk County, and a former gay disco known on Fridays — rave nights — as Caffeine. "It's all natural," explains a fountain-haired cashier as the boys head out toward the parental Buick. "Caffeine stands for natural highs. Rave is, like, natural speed, just dancing, no gang stuff. It's like" — and she pauses, watching a hot dog roll over inside a roaster — "it's like the 60's."

Raves were the youth event of the late 80's. They began in northern England, where thousands of kids would spend whole days outdoors dancing spasmodically to very fast "techno" music. Raves were underground and, some said, political. There was talk of releasing the "primordial energy" of the Earth through technology." Mostly there was a lot of the drug Ecstasy, mixed with Gluconate, an energy-inducing drink tasting like Gatorade, and amyl nitrite. The star techno deejays were all American, and in time, raves spread to cities in the United States — to V.F.W. halls and warehouses; one was even held under a Belt Parkway overpass in Brooklyn. Then, as a boy in a gas mask later explains, "the cops came, like, forever."

Caffeine offers a compromise: primary rave elements (a dark, nondescript warehouse; wall-quaking techno) mixed with standard club features like alcohol and advertising (officially, no drugs, at least not on the premises). Ira Levy, the manager, who at 29 has had much experience with clubs and rave, says, "It's like that bar in the middle of nowhere in 'The Blues Brothers,' and the audience can't believe what's inside."

Photographs by Philip Greenberg for The New York Times

ABOVE At the Deer Park rave, known as Caffeine, the club populations of Long Island unite like warring clans, who then dance spasmodically to very fast "techno" music.

FAR LEFT For young people on Long Island, Caffeine is an imported piece of New York City.

LEFT Techno music is a highly disposable pop musical form: "You play it once," explained the deejay, "and then some other guy plays it, you gotta throw it out."

What's inside, say those on thick lines outside, is "not Long Island." Barbara, 18, of Centereach, a "sort of model" in black Lycra and arm-denting jewelry, says that "here, it's not, like, any one sexuality." Her friend John, who works at King Kullen, pushing items forward on the shelf, "leveling them" so there will seem to be more, likes it "that Caffeine doesn't make you be the same boring person."

Here, the club populations of Long Island unite like warring clans. Before Caffeine, there were the Jewish American princess clubs in JAP locales (the Five Towns, Island Park, various "corporate" points along the North Shore). There were "Guido" places, all those South Shore Italian bars and discos ("Joey joints," says one Merrick girl, referring to that patron saint of Guidos, Joey Buttafuoco). And separate from these were black and Hispanic clubs and the traditional bars-with-a-pool-table.

But at Caffeine, midway between North and South Shores, it's all-island: Ravers and bikers and girls in skirts the length of washcloths out to "par-ty!" toblot out the days spent parked behind some doctor's office window or inside Caldor's. Alex That, 23, of Levittown, a co-owner and promoter, explains the draw: "An underground is a weekend; a club lasts for years."

For local kids, the first purely island-born generation, Caffeine is a piece of the city imported 52 exits out on the Long Island Expressway. "You go in the city, like to Limelight," says a girl with purplish Amy Fisher hair draping an eye, "and they look at you and you're 18 and suddenly it's 19 to get in. You just spent 50 bucks getting there, and where are you?" Caffeine provides remedial clubbing, a kind of suburban club bootcamp for kids who think the city is too far away, too expensive, too tough. It's a safe place, with a "real 60's feel." It's true this feeling is safeguarded by large men with flashlights and headsets. "But it's totally free," says the girl with Amy hair, "compared to boring life."

In Warehouse B, a back room lined with carnival games and a case of scorpions, a techno nostalgia night is under way. "It's for people who love the music," says Mr. That, "and they miss their favorite techno from when we opened, like, in '91." Techno, a speedy synthesized hybrid of hip-hop and mid-80's "house" is a highly disposable pop musical form: ("You play it once," says the star deejay Frankie Bones, "and then some other guy plays it, you gotta throw it out. It'sover, dead, get outta here.")

Mr. That and a high school friend, Kevin Kraft, took over the club, then owned by Mr. Kraft's father, "to help Long Island keep up with the music and to educate people about how to listen, how to get into a rave head." The rave head, or philosophy, dictates nonviolent fashion (ravers often look like swaddled scarecrows) and an aerobic nonalcoholic high. "You do what you gotta do to promote the rave head," Mr. That says. "Without it, you get fights. Undesirables." What he means is "you get Guidos," a term that was once used to describe slick-suited Italian guys and that now covers anyone hinting at a too-macho stance, any guy with a Davy Crockett "do"; a muscly tank top; a Coors bottle defensively covering the Levi's crotch.

> The rave philosophy dictates nonviolent fashion and an aerobic high.

"Either he goes, O-U-T, or he gets tuned to rave," said Joe Cruz, the bouncer, who has witnessed Guido rehabilitation firsthand. "I haven't broken up a fight in two years here."

And so tonight, "in celebration of peace," says one deejay, it's 1990. There's a linoleum floor strip for breakdancing. There's a bar crowd, buying alcohol instead of the usual Jolt, an all-sugar, high-caffeine cola. Three young Korean kids move on to the floor, hopping lightly in place near the strip. Two hold beer bottles; one hugs an Sesame Street doll strapped to his chest. "The kid feels good when he's wearing Ernie," explains a 21-year-old man selling T-shirts. "Ernie says: We like our childhood. We like that other people don't try to rip it off our face."

On the main floor, the raving floor, are the hardcore boys smearing Vicks on their faces (it enhances the high) and, at the edges, the "spectators," the ones who have accessories — a sock hat, a disco whistle — but not the "total body spirit." All around, dressed in bustiers and tent-size jeans, are the girls, working hard tonight at imitating the boys. They toss out rap-like gestures, a modified air guitar. But it's the boys who form the dense sweaty nucleus, the true raving womb at the center.

"Those girls are wearing, like, underwear," comments a 20-year-old unemployed carpenter wrapped in cellophane and reeking of sweat. (True ravers often rave into the next day. Showering interferes with this.) "The underwear girls don't get that it's not about the display of you."

Girls don't "get it," some say, because they try to bring contact into a dance form about solitary movement — sex as opposed to masturbation. Others believe girls can't rave because they typically carry leather pouches, cigarette cases, actual purses, while real ravers carry knapsacks filled with gear. One boy has stashed two giant pacifiers, Devil Dogs and 30 glow-in-the-dark necklaces. Another has a thermos of Kool-Aid, Flintstones vitamins and a Ken doll. Someone has brought a box of matzohs. A bustier girl passes a matzoh slice to her friend, who passes it on. They cheer as the matzoh makes its way through the crowd. Kevin Kraft, pointing this out, says: "See? Who knows what they were doing before they came. Now they're doing just what they want."

Outside, on a wood-slatted patio arranged in risers, some girls — silver moons on their faces, glitter webs in their hair — are skipping around, crooning about how open and "60's" it all is. It's 35 degrees outside but they are coatless; one is barefoot. Their only concern right now is how commercial an article like this might make Caffeine.

"In the 50's and 60's, people left the hippies, the Grateful Dead all alone," says an angry boy. "That's why they lasted so long. Why do we want people from the city coming out to ruin it? This is our perfect little thing."

Sandra and Laura, who claim to be 18 although they also claim to be Levittown sophomores, look around at this perfect little thing, unimpressed. It is cold. They had thought the scene would be weirder. "But," Laura says, "what are you gonna do? Like, sit behind the high school drinking beers?"

"It's boring," Sandra says, wiggling a stacked slinky of bracelets on each arm. "Here, it's more . . . the 60's."

Except that it could be anytime on Long Island. Change the cars, the slang, the preferred drugs, and you still have local kids dressing up for an event that began "in the city" and moved out — some gender-bending ritual that is so "totally free compared to boring life" that no one notices it's an expertly staged imitation.

"Who cares?" Sandra says. "It's not like you wanna go out with a raveguy."

"You want someone who takes a shower," Laura says, clarifying. "Maybe from Bensonhurst. Or guys from the city."

"We go to the city all the time," Laura says, looking at Sandra, who tries to recall precisely when. "Like it was not too . . . it was recently," Sandra says.

Laura coughs a giggle away as she says, "Once we went."

peace," he said. He owns a house on Eleuthera, has family there (on his mother's side) and, as far as he knows, the island is devoid of rock critics.

"It doesn't bother me," he said of the critical sneers he has received since his first album, "Let Love Rule," came out in 1989. "They're entitled to their opinion. Look, I do what I do because it comes out of me. There's no 'concept.' There's no, 'Oh, what kind of album am I going to make? What kind of sound is it going to be? What kind of trousers am I going to wear?' I just do it. I'm doing what's natural to me."

A Village Voice reviewer once quipped, "I have seen the past of rock-and-roll and it is Lenny Kravitz."

Besides using vintage guitars, Fender Rhodes keyboards and Marshall amplifiers, Mr. Kravitz records everything on "rare gear" from the 60's and 70's: old mikes, old consoles, never more than 16 tracks, never digital, totally analog. On the cover of his new album, he sports a floral shirt and furry white coat evoking the strutting pimp-dandy esthetic immortalized by Jimi Hendrix, 70's "blaxploitation" movies like "Superfly" and the Huggy Bear character on "Starsky and Hutch."

"He's just such a child of the 70's," said Arianne Phillips, a fashion stylist who has been helping Mr. Kravitz put together his flamboyant ensembles since they met in New York seven years ago. "I mean, his mom was on 'The Jeffersons.' You can't get any more 70's than that."

Mr. Kravitz's mother, Roxie Roker, played the black wife of a white husband on that classic sitcom; his father, Sy Kravitz, is a television producer. Young Leonard Albert Kravitz grew up knowing both Upper East Side affluence and Bedford-Stuyvesant poverty. When his family moved to Los Angeles, he transferred to Beverly Hills High and made friends with another half-black, half-Jewish aspiring rock star named Saul Hudson, a.k.a. Slash, from Guns 'n' Roses.

RUNNING through these oft-reported biographical details, Mr. Kravitz's conversation goes from knowing regular guy to blissed-out spiritualist, from heartfelt confession to halting monosyllables. His ex-wife, the actress Lisa Bonet, lives in Los Angeles with their 4-year-old daughter, Zoe. Much of his 1991 album, "Mama Said," chronicled the relationship's demise. "I still love her very much," he said. "More than she'll ever know."

Occasionally, Mr. Kravitz will lift his heavy lids and favor a listener with a charming smile.

He looks much healthier than any bona-fide hippie. Having found God and health food, he has sworn off every drug but marijuana.

"I don't see a problem with herb," he said matter-of-factly.

Ask the inevitable questions about his clothing choices, and he will explain that he has always dressed this way, that he tried wearing straight-leg pants in high school and they just looked "stupid" on him, but that his clothes were never meant to be "this thing."

Just the other day, he was walking up Madison Avenue when he found himself face to face with two teen-age girls heading home from school in platforms, bell bottoms — the full youth uniform of 1993.

"They freaked out when they saw me," he said. "It was really weird."

He can't open Vogue without seeing models dressed like him. He said "big name designers" have called him and said, "You know, you did this — you brought back flares," asking him to endorse their lines. He won't say which designers, but the retro/grunge diva Anna Sui admits that "Lenny was the first person of note out there to wear this stuff." She said that although she designed some clothes for his Details photo shoot, he never wore them.

"It's Lenny Kravitzland out there," he said, emphasizing that he could cash in big but refuses to. Ms. Phillips still buys his clothes at thrift shops, or has them made to his specifications. His rationale for doing a Gap ad was that Miles Davis did one. "Miles," he noted, "was always very stylish."

A lyric on the new album snaps sarcastically: "You're just the kind that's up on all the latest trends." It's not a compliment, even though all the latest trends — neo-psychedelia, flares, pot, 70's revivalism — happen to have been foreshadowed by Mr. Kravitz.

"It's not about nostalgia!" he insisted, again and again. "You've gotta get rid of that. You've gotta write that! It's about the melody and the song and feeling behind it."

He said he was tired of people "telling me what I mean and what I'm feeling and what I'm saying and where I get it from and 'this is the way you are,' because I don't know what I am."

"Every album I change," he said. "Every day I change. I just make music."

Sneers from the critics? Kravitz says: 'They're entitled to their opinion. Look, I do what I do because it comes out of me.'

Craig Ross, Lenny Kravitz's guitarist, looks like Jimi Hendrix's longtime sideman Noel Redding.

Quite a soliloquy, softly spoken, seductively inflected with wounded indignation. But how much of it is true?

Point out to Mr. Kravitz that the song "Are You Gonna Go My Way" sounds so much like Hendrix it could almost be a cover, and he'll swear up and down that "it doesn't sound like Jimi to me."

"I didn't think Hendrix when I did it," he said.

How about the rest of the album? "My Love" isn't the Beatles' "I've Got [illegible]ing"? The rasta anthem "Eleuthera" isn't classic Bob Marley?

"No, not at all," he said. "I don't think about any other artists when I do my music. It just comes out. I think about myself."

Ingrid Chavez, a singer-songwriter, sued Mr. Kravitz for thinking too much about himself and not enough about her contribution to Madonna's "Justify My Love," which Mr. Kravitz produced (sampling, again, this time the rhythm track from the rap group Public Enemy). Ms. Chavez claimed that she had written the lyrics and that Mr. Kravitz had duped her out of both the writing credit and royalties. The suit was settled out of court, and Mr. Kravitz refuses to discuss it.

Jimi Hendrix, Led Zeppelin, Bob Marley, Sly Stone, John Lennon, Marvin Gaye, Curtis Mayfield, the Velvet Underground, Boston — Mr. Kravitz can sound like all of them, and many more.

"Déjà entendu," is how Rolling Stone described the Kravitz sound, adding that the best material on the new album "transcends its influences without leaving them completely behind."

Anthony DiCurtis, Rolling Stone's record review editor, thinks Mr. Kravitz "just hasn't really emerged out of this welter of influences into his own voice — that's what kind of annoys critics." Especially since Mr. Kravitz does it so skillfully, with shrewd melodic hooks and rich, fat 70's sounds.

"I could listen to him forever," Mr. DiCurtis said. "If he was dismissable, this wouldn't even be an issue."

Most of Mr. Kravitz's fans don't know and don't care where he gets his music or his clothes. As far as they're concerned, when he sang "Give Peace a Chance" with Sean Lennon during the Persian Gulf War, it wasn't a cover. What's more, he knows they don't know the difference.

"I think he's very canny about the whole thing," said Jim Hunter, who gave Mr. Kravitz's new album a near rave in Musician magazine. "I even think he's canny about his limitations."

Musicians are less enraged by this rock-savior posturing than critics. Mr. Kravitz has collaborated with many of his idols: Mick Jagger, Curtis Mayfield, Aerosmith, Prince.

And Mr. Redding, for one, is quite amused.

"It's quite flattering, really," he said, reached at his home in Ireland. "There's obviously the Hendrix influence, but I don't think he's trying to copy. He's just using the feel or, if you'll pardon the expression, the groove."

If Mr. Redding doesn't mind, why should anybody else?

Mr. Kravitz seems to have achieved a profound indifference to the debates that rage around him. And at the Time Cafe, at least, there's no question that he's an arbiter, not a follower, of what is hip. He signaled the end of the discussion by putting on his Giorgio Armani sunglasses. Medusan dreadlocks shaking like so many link sausages, he made a loping, princely exit.

And on the wall above the bar, the Time Cafe's clock was, as always, running backward.

Terrence McCarthy for The New York Times

Celebration of the 50th anniversary of LSD, in San Francisco.

Sobering Words About Drugs

To the Editor:

We read the article "Tripping, but Not Failing" [May 2] and were aghast that the reporter Trip Gabriel made no mention of the harmful side effects of hallucinogenic drugs such as LSD. He could have asked any number of experts in the field of drug treatment about LSD and been told about debilitating hallucinogenic flashbacks, delusional and mood disorders suffered by LSD users. Surely the fact that Terence McKenna says that the psilocybin mushroom "is the megaphone used by an alien, intergalactic Other to communicate with mankind" is enough for us to wonder if taking LSD has done something to his mental faculties.

This is the second article in which the Styles section has chosen to report the return of the "normalization" of drug use ("Repotted" by Ian Fisher, March 7) without mentioning the horrible dangers of drug abuse.

For a more realistic view, I refer you to the May 1 obituary of David Waymer, the 34-year-old former National Football League defensive back. [A preliminary autopsy detected cocaine in his blood and urine and a slight narrowing of an artery leading to the heart.]

The paragraph that is most telling says, "Since 1986, when the Maryland basketball star Len Bias died after taking cocaine, several well-known athletes have died after using cocaine, which even in moderate doses is known to cause seizures and heart failure."

Whether it's LSD, marijuana, cocaine or heroin, the message from The Times should clearly be that drug abuse is dangerous and should not be portrayed as just another fashion trend.

Questioning Accomplishments

To the Editor:

I am puzzled by the inclusion of the "Low-Fi Rockers" story in the Styles section on April 11.

If the accomplishments of the two young men who are the subjects of the story [Mickey Melchiondo and Aaron Freeman] deserve a half page of space, why is the information about their recording career confined to less than one-quarter of the article?

If it is their "style" that justifies their claim to fame, why should the details of their super-sloppiness (the absence of soap, shampoo and clean towels in their apartment, the presence of a "a whole closetful of old bottles with a little beer in the bottom of each one") and their mega-mischief (blowing up mailboxes, smashing garbage cans, pumpkins, nativity scenes, "everything") be considered evidence of that claim?

Perhaps we should be impressed by the highly principled decision one of the young men made about the apartment the two shared: "Mick was working but I wasn't. It wasn't fair for him to pay the rent but not me, so neither of us paid the rent. So eventually we moved out of there, and when we had enough money, we paid." No mention is made of an attempt to find out what the owner of the building considered "fair."

Is there a plan to include articles in the future that call attention to some of the less flamboyant but no less productive or interesting young people in our midst? If that seems inappropriate for the Styles section, how about adding a Substance section?

A Lesson In Language

Associated Press

Yasir Arafat in his kaffiyeh.

To the Editor:

Re the Out There column "History on the Head" (April 25), "kaffiyeh" does not come from the word "Kufa," which is a city in Iraq, but rather kaffiyeh in Arabic means "handkerchief," and that is what it is — just a large handkerchief that one covers his head with. It did not start only 1,000 years ago. For over 2,000 years, the Jews used it in Baghdad and in Yemen, and they still use it in Yemen.

Lois Smith Brady

Sheila Collins, Mark Schulman

New York Marxist School, Manhattan, May 1

MARK SCHULMAN, 47, is the chairman of the communications department at the New School for Social Research in Greenwich Village. An antiwar protester in the 1960's, he has never given up his ponytail or his political activism. He recently said, "Getting older for me has meant not deciding we were wrong about radical change, but wrong about how long it would take."

He met Sheila Collins in 1986. The father of four, he was separated at the time; she was a single working mother, anything but starry-eyed about romance, and a student in one of his night classes. Today, at 39, she is a master's degree candidate at the Annenberg School of Communications at the University of Pennsylvania.

From the start, not everyone thought they were perfect for each other — he is white and Jewish, and she is black and Baptist. But Mr. Schulman described their different backgrounds as "just another complication" in the complicated matter of love.

"It's really an issue of mobility," he said recently. "We can't go to lots of places in New York City, and certainly lots of places in the United States."

In many ways, their wedding on May 1 was like a community meeting. It was held in TriBeCa at the New York Marxist School, where the bulletin boards were covered with fliers announcing rallies and demonstrations, and workshops at the Theater of the Oppressed Laboratory.

About 80 guests gathered in a lecture space furnished with metal chairs and unframed oil paintings and a chalkboard that happened to have a love poem written on it.

The couple, their families, the Rev. Bill Malcolmson and several guests spoke, creating a patchwork of political commentary, reminiscences, poetry, thoughts on stepmotherhood and a short history of interracial marriage.

"Congratulations, Mark and Sheila, my comrades," said Sam Anderson, a guest wearing dreadlocks. "One of the ways people help combat racism is through genuine love relationships."

After the couple said their vows, Mr. Schulman invited everyone to stay for "a little bit of food and a little bit of wine." A buffet table was covered with trays of fried chicken, deviled eggs and quiche, along with a homemade wedding cake. The multicultural crowd balanced paper plates on their laps.

Ayoka Chenzira, a film maker, recounted her search for a wedding gift: "I go to a bookstore and say to this poor man, 'O.K., there's this African-American woman and this Jewish man getting married at the Marxist School. What do you got?' "

Another guest, Lori Hiris, wore black leather pants and a black lace shirt and carried a motorcycle helmet. She and her girlfriend, Lourdes Lopez, rode to the wedding on a Kawasaki 750.

"I'm a feminist," Ms. Hiris said. "I would never call myself a Marxist, but I do respect Mark's willingness to push for a world that represents diversity, change, freedom and tolerance."

Throughout the ceremony and reception, many guests were tearful. While there wasn't much pomp and circumstance, one felt instead the presence of hope, social concern and a great love story. It was hard not to cry.

The bride, who wore a black-and-white sleeveless dress, said afterward, "It was a tear-jerker, wasn't it?"

Michelle DePaulo, Thomas Dewey

Michelle Clare DePaulo, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. S. F. DePaulo of Centreville, Del., was married yesterday to Thomas E. L. Dewey, a son of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas E. Dewey Jr. of New York. Msgr. Clement Lemon performed the Roman Catholic ceremony at St. Joseph's on the Brandywine in Greenville, Del.

Mrs. Dewey is a marketing services manager at Revlon Inc. in New York. She graduated from Georgetown University and received an M.B.A. from New York University. Her father is the president of Erectors Inc. and the Continental Equipment Company, construction companies in Wilmington, Del.

Mr. Dewey is an associate at the law firm of Cravath, Swaine & Moore in New York. He graduated from Harvard University and received a law degree from Georgetown University.

His father is a partner in McFarland Dewey & Company, an investment banking concern in New York. The bridegroom is a grandson of the late Thomas E. Dewey, the former Presidential candidate and Governor of New York.

Vanessa Green, Alexander Spiro

Vanessa Daryl Green, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Gary Green of Potomac, Md., was married last evening to Alexander Charles Stiefel Spiro, a son of Herbert J. Spiro of Austin, Tex., and Elizabeth Spiro of Oslo. Judge Laurence H. Silberman of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in Washington, performed the ceremony at the Metropolitan Club of the City of Washington.

Mrs. Spiro, 28, is an associate with the New York law firm of Shearman & Sterling. She graduated with honors from Vassar College and received a law degree from Fordham University. Her father is the director of the legal department of the Air Line Pilots Association in Washington. Her mother, Shia Green, is a psychotherapist in Gaithersburg, Md.

Mr. Spiro, 29, is an associate at the New York law firm of Sidley & Austin. He graduated from Columbia University and received a law degree from Georgetown University. His mother is the chief of the political section in the American Embassy in Oslo. Her father, a former United States Ambassador to Cameroon and Guinea, from 1975 to 1977, is an author of political science books. The bridegroom's maternal grandfather, Howard C. Petersen of Radnor, Pa., was the Assistant Secretary of War in the Truman Administration, and chairman of the Fidelity Bank in Philadelphia. The bridegroom is also a stepson of Marion B. Spiro of Austin.

Carving Out a Garden

Photographs by Karen Bussolini

NEWTOWN, Conn. — She's an expert on day lilies, so I was saving her garden until July. But when Sydney Eddison called to say, "You must come to see my primroses," I couldn't resist. I knew that spring would reveal to me not only the primroses of her garden, but more of its soul, before the trees leafed out over the rocky hills around Newtown.

"I think the least you do to the landscape is the best," Mrs. Eddison said in late April, as we walked northward across a sweep of grass that stretches across the hill behind her house like a long green terrace.

"This dip in the lawn was where the iniquitous pool was," she said. "We built it in 1963 — and pushed it in 15 years later." This is just one of those little mistakes you make while building a garden over 35 years.

Mrs. Eddison's first book, "A Patchwork Garden" (Harper & Row, 1990), recounts her adventures as she and her faithful chainsawing/digging husband, Martin (who hates gardening), tried to find the bear, as she puts it, in the landscape.

The bear refers to a story her husband likes to tell about a Maine carver who made little bears out of wood, each unique. When asked the secret of his art, he would reply: "I just look at the piece of wood till I see the bear." Which is what Michelangelo did with his stone. And which, when you think about it, is what a good gardener does, after making mistakes like building pools.

But in cutting into the hill behind the house to create a long, flat site for a rectangular pool, the Eddisons inadvertently stumbled upon the bear. The gash in the land drew the eye from the house to the old stone wall on the edge of an overgrown field where saplings and briers had stopped the eye. And Mrs. Eddison thought, "If I just cleared that field . . ."

Thirty years later, she walked across the old pool site toward the woods, where the primroses grow. To her left ran a 100-foot perennial bed with tall red and white Emperor tulips and clumps of white daffodils, peonies not yet in bloom and the grassy-green fronds of day lilies, promising plenty of color later on. (Mrs. Eddison's second book, "A Passion for Daylilies," published by HarperCollins in 1992, traces the history of that flower, hundreds of which bloom here in midsummer.) To her right ran an elegantly unpruned 100-foot hedge of juniper. And up the hill, past glacial rock and hardy rhododendrons, a regular battalion of white and yellow daffodils bloomed in the cleared field.

"I just whack a hole, throw the bulb in and stomp on it," Mrs. Eddison said. "It's rough up there. Some can take it; some can't."

The tulips, though, keep coming back every year. (If the voles get yours, make an underground cage by planting the bulbs in little plastic laundry baskets. Cut out the solid plastic bottom, replace it with half-inch mesh hardware cloth, add a layer of soil and put in the bulbs, about six inches deep.)

The primroses lie beyond all this, nestled in the woods, along the boggy banks of a little pond dug by the Eddisons' predecessors.

"They thought there was a spring here, so they gouged this out years ago," Mrs. Eddison said. "And immediately discovered that it dried up in the summer."

But Mrs. Eddison fell for the same trick of nature: "I heard this wonderful rushing sound," she said. "It isn't really a stream. It's the runoff from all the snow and rain."

Still, playing around with water is like being a kid again, and Mrs. Eddison started to shape the flow with stone.

"Every rock you see along this stream I moved," she said. "And I steal leaves and soil from the woods to make the paths."

And this is where the Japanese primroses (Primula japonica), which are bog lovers, thrive. "Though I have to keep beating back the goldenseal and the creeping phlox," Mrs. Eddison said. Both are bog hogs.

So are the maples and the tulip trees, whose surface roots slurp up much of the moisture that primroses need.

The Japanese primroses had put out plenty of rosettes of crinkled fresh green leaves, and in mid-May their whorled flowers, held high on tall stalks, will open in shades of pink and red. The drumstick primulas (P. denticulata) also like wet conditions. "But when the bog freezes, the ice rises up like a honeycomb and can rip the roots of the smaller plants out," Mrs. Eddison said.

When Sydney Eddison says, 'You must come to see my primroses,' you go.

Primroses are easy to grow from seed, so you will have plenty of plants to try in different spots. And you can play with different species, of which there are 500, with habitats ranging from the mountains to the bogs. So experiment, experiment.

In general, the key to growing healthy primroses is moist, well-drained soil, so keep adding compost whenever you can.

While the primroses are the stars of Mrs. Eddison's woodland garden, there are other players here: wood poppies, whose yellow faces look like big buttercups, and the pale green fiddleheads of ostrich ferns, which also will take over if you let them.

In March, great waves of snowdrops had bloomed beneath the tulip trees. "A friend gave me a clump years ago with strict instructions to separate them all and plant each one at a time," she said. Which she did. And it paid off.

The bumblebees were buzzing all over the bluebells, and the May apples were just about to bloom. There was a soft light to the forest, and plenty of sky, because the trees were still bare. This is primrose time, for sure.

We stopped to admire P. vulgaris sipthorpii, a pale lavender pink with a yellow center that starts blooming as early as mid-March.

"It looks fragile, but it's happy as a clam here," Mrs. Eddison said. "It doesn't like dry conditions."

Then she pointed out the wild English primrose (P. vulgaris), which has a yellow flower as pale as fresh sweet butter and a deep gold center. A cousin, the English cowslip (P. veris), bloomed right beside it. The cowslip has a four-inch stalk with umbels of yellow, slightly fragrant flowers with light green calyxes. Oxlips look much the same, but the flowers are flatter. (Like a parent of twins, you have to raise the two to know the difference.) These vernal primroses, as they are called, are usually grown from seed, because it's hard to find the plants.

The polyanthas, the ones that come in Easter-egg colors, are thought to be a natural cross between the cowslip and the English primrose, and they're easy to grow.

Polyanthas are also known to put out sports, or mutations. And Mrs. Eddison is fond of a variety in her garden called hose-in-hose. Its layered yellow flowers apparently reminded someone of "puffy men's breeches over hose," she said.

We stopped to admire a primrose called P. kisoana, which has woolly silvery green leaves and delicate violet flowers. It spreads by runners, "and the fuzzy foliage looks like Heuchera," she said, adding, "It's almost a ground cover in woodland moist soil."

Mrs. Eddison has been growing primroses for 13 years, which isn't long when you think of how many species there are to try.

"But start with a just few plants," she said. "Japonica, if you have water. Then try the denticulatas, and vulgaris, and the polyanthas, to give you heart."

Then, join your local rock garden society, she said. And get ready for a lifetime of primulas. Or primulas as a way of life.

Every primula has its trick. Denticulata, the drumstick primrose, for example, is likely to rot in the winter if its soil gets too wet.

"But take heart," Mrs. Eddison said. "I had a wonderful time. I began to see what I was doing as I did it."

THIS WEEK

A Time to Plant

Hardly anybody I know got peas into the ground — it was too wet. Now it's too late, so wait until next year. Get those potatoes in, and plant more lettuce, arugula and carrots. Plant a whole field of basil if you have the space, and don't skimp on the parsley and dill.

Plant zinnia, cosmos, marigold and sunflower seeds right in the garden. Or plant the seedlings of these hardy flowers now. Transplant evergreens and shrubs, and continue to plant potted roses and perennials.

Remove the faded flowers from tulips and other bulbs. Doing so will keep the plants from forming seedpods, and all that energy can be stored in the bulbs for next year's blooms.

Prune forsythia, lilacs and other spring-blooming shrubs after they finish flowering. Divide crowded perennials, and spread them out over the garden, or give them to friends.

Don't jump the gun by putting out tomatoes, peppers, eggplants and other tender annuals before warm weather arrives. Nights are still cool, and these tropical plants will just sit in the ground and shiver.

Where a 'Good Read' Is a 'Good Listen'

Photographs by Ozier Muhammad/The New York Times

Heller & Jed Audiobooks in Manhattan is New York City's first store devoted solely to the spoken word on audiotape.

HEARD any good books lately? Listening instead of reading is a growing practice. Joggers and commuters are plugging in to Tom Clancy and Anne Rice, as well as light FM.

A best seller is a best seller, and New York City has its first store devoted solely to the spoken word on audio tape. Heller & Jed Audiobooks, in Manhattan's financial district, sells more than 2,500 titles. About half the stock is fiction, which is also available for rental ($2.99 for three days for most abridged fiction; there's a $10 membership fee).

But is it literacy or is it Memorex? "It's entertainment," said Alan Kahn, browsing last Monday. "It's like listening to radio programs when I was a kid." Mr. Kahn, who owns and manages commercial real estate in Manhattan, bought Isaac Asimov's "Forward the Foundation" (Bantam Doubleday Dell, $23.50), a six-hour, four-tape set, to add to his collection of some 500 books on tape.

"An abridged Ross McDonald is a perfect three-hour car ride to the mountains," he said. He's not troubled by the fact that many books on tape are abridged. "It doesn't work with James Michener," he said. "It seems like details are missing. But if they take one of the subplots out of a Ross McDonald mystery, who knows?"

Spoken-word tapes were once published mainly for the blind, but with the proliferation of portable cassette players, the audience has expanded. Most new fiction is issued simultaneously by the same publisher in hardcover and on tape. The most common format is two cassettes that run for a total of three hours, priced at about $16.

The reader is often the author or a famous actor: Mel Gibson reads Daphne du Maurier's "My Cousin Rachel" (HarperCollins, $17), and Willem Dafoe, Stephen King's "Langoliers" (Penguin-Highbridge, $29, unabridged).

The store, which opened on April 29, had some strange requests in its first few days.

Bob Heller, who owns the store with Bruce Jed, said: "Somebody came in and asked: 'Do you have Mussolini's speeches on tape? My uncle is dying and he wants to hear them one last time.'" They couldn't fulfill the request.

Jon Olsen, the store's manager, added, "Somebody else wanted anything by Hemingway not read by Charlton Heston," They were able to help him with "Hemingway Short Stories," read by Alexander Scourby (Listening Library, $16).

Self-help and motivational tapes are prominent. Works by Rabbi Harold Kushner, Dr. Bernie Segal, Leo Buscaglia, Dr. M. Scott Peck and other happiness gurus are all there.

Deronda Terrell, a paralegal who was on her lunch hour, bought "Feeling Fine Affirmations" by Louise Hay (Hay House, $10). "I'll listen to it in the subway, instead of focusing on other people's conversations," she said.

Paul Zarookian, who is in charge of sales for a financial service company, picked up Zig Ziglar's "Top Performance" (HarperCollins, $11). "I have lots of salespeople who drive around all day," he said. "Wouldn't it be nice to give them this?"

Ease On Down The Road

For those who can't get enough of Dr. M. Scott Peck's insights in book form, Simon & Schuster offers "Further Along the Road Less Traveled," a series of the spiritual psychiatrist's talks recorded before live audiences and not available in print.

Some subtitles in the series of hour-long cassettes are "Sexuality and Spirituality," "Self-Love Versus Self-Esteem," "Mythology and Human Nature" and "Blame and Forgiveness" ($9.95 each at Heller & Jed).

Letting the Opposition Win a Tourney for You

ALEXANDER SHABALOV won the Hudson International Tournament at Pace University in Pleasantville, N.Y., April 13-23 by letting his opponents make the mistakes. He did not make any: the 25-year-old Latvian grandmaster was the only undefeated player.

In Round 8, he laid on strong positional pressure against the Estonian grandmaster Jaan Ehlvest with several nice pawn sacrifices.

Against the Scheveningen Variation of the Sicilian Defense, development with 6 f4 Be7 7 Bd3 avoids the risks of a possibly overexuberant attack with 6 g4 and the delicate positional play of 6 Be2. Lately, this neglected mode of play is gaining favor.

Shabalov's 11 b4 prevented Black from using c5 as a knight outpost and also prepared the flanchetto with 12 Bb2. The chief question was whether Black could obtain counterplay with 13 ... a5. After 14 Ncb5, Ehlvest might have tried 14 ... ab 15 ab d5, yet after 16 c3 de 17 Be4 Nf6 18 Rd1 Qe8 19 Bd3 White has the superior mobility and the initiative.

After 14 ... e5, Shabalov sacrificed a pawn with 15 Rd1!? ab 16 ab ef 17 Be2 and a second pawn after 17 ... Ncb8 18 c4!? Be4. Of course, he recovered one at once with 19 Nd6 Bd6 20 Rd6, but after 20 ... Qe7 21 Qc3 f6 22 Rfd1 Rfe8 (22 ... g5? 23 Ng5! fg 24 Bg4 Nf8 [24 ... Rc7? 25 Be6 forces mate] 25 Bc8 Rc8 26 Rf8 wins for White) 23 Qd2 Ba8 24 Bf1, Ehlvest should not have been so quick to give back the second pawn. He could have tried 24 ... Qe3 25 Qe3 fe, with the plan of using the passed e pawn to slow down White's initiative.

Nevertheless, Ehlvest's defense could have been proven adequate had he answered 30 Bh3 by 30 ... Nc4! 31 Bc8 Nd6 32 Bd7 Rd8 33 Rd6 Nf8 34 Rb8 Rd7, which should yield Black a draw. Instead, he missed his chance and fell into serious trouble with 30 ... Ra8?

On 35 Bf3, he could not capture with 35 ... Ne4 because of the powerful 36 Rdd7! After 35 ... Nh4 36 Rdd7 Nf5 37 ef there was no point in 37 ... Rg8 because 38 Re7 h6 39 h4 Nh7 40 Bd4 would soon win the b6 pawn and end the struggle.

After 37 ... Rbd8, Ehlvest hoped for 38 Rg7? Rd1 39 Kf2 Rd2, but Shabalov decisively obtained an outside passed pawn with 38 c5! bc 39 b6. After 39 ... Rb8 40 Rab7 there was no help in 40 ... Rb7 41 Rb7 Ne4 42 Rd7 c4 43 Ba3 c3 44 b7 c2 45 Rc7 followed by 46 Rc8.

On 44 b7, Ehlvest could not defend by 44 ... Rab8 because of 45 Bc1 Ng5 46 Bg5 fg 47 f8, when the 48 Rh8mate threat can only be delayed by senseless sacrifices. He played 44 ... Ra2, but after 45 Rg2!, the threat of 46 Rh8 was annihilating and he gave up.

Ol' Love-Him Tender Becomes Legal Tender

Unicover World Trade Corporation

Boxed set of three Elvis Presley coins from the Marshall Islands.

WASN'T it bound to happen? First, those paintings on black velvet. Then, decorated dinner plates. Then the much-ballyhooed United States postage stamps. And now, yes — Elvis coins. The Marshall Islands has released three legal-tender coins to mark the 40th anniversary of the year that Elvis cut his first record, "My Happiness" and "That's When Your Heartaches Begin."

One might wonder what connection a small island republic in the South Pacific might have to the King of the Rock-and-Roll. In a news release, the Finance Minister, Ruben R. Zachras, explains all: "In the Republic, music is an artistic medium practiced by young and old alike. It is an important part of weekly religious activities and of particular importance to the traditional Christmas annual holiday events."

Yo, Ruben! We're talking Elvis here! The King! The man who brought foot-stomping black rhythm-and-blues to toe-tapping white America. The Elvis who still has millions of fans years after his death. The Elvis who is said to reappear from time to time in shopping malls around the United States.

Notwithstanding the Finance Minister's slightly outmoded tone, the coins themselves are quite attractive. The $50 silver proof commemorative, about one and a half inches across and weighing one troy ounce, depicts a mature Elvis. Two smaller-denomination coins portray Elvis as a young man: a $10 coin that is made of brass and is 10-sided instead of round, and a $5 coin that is made of cupronickel.

The younger Elvis seems more realistic than the older. The $50 coin shows him with a strongly chiseled face, a face he never had in life but might have grown into.

The coins cost $65 for the set, or their face value if ordered individually. More information: (800) 443-3232.

On Whales and Dolphins

The Marshall Islands has also issued a 12-part series of commemorative coins detailing the whales and dolphins of the Pacific.

The $50 silver coins are about one and a half inches in diameter and weigh one troy ounce. They are limited to 25,000 sets. After an order is placed, one coin is shipped each month until the set is completed. Each of the 12 coins depicts a different marine mammal on the front and the Republic of Marshall Islands seal on the reverse. The coins cost $50 apiece with a $6 shipping and handling charge on each shipment. More information: (800) 443-3232.

Tutorials On Videotape

THE knowledge of some of the world's best photographers is being offered on videotape — and at a discount. Educational tapes that feature, among others, Mary Ellen Mark, Ernst Haas, Brian Lanker, Sam Abell, Rich Clarkson and William Albert Allard, which were previously available only to the educational community, are now being sold to the public. The 11 tapes, all in the VHS format, have been marked down, from $50 each, to $29.95.

Dr. R. Smith Schuneman, who is the chairman of Media Loft, the company that distributes the videos, and who is a former chairman of the photographic communications program at the University of Minnesota, has videotaped more than 350 photographers as part of a project to give budding photographers the benefit of professionals' experiences. (He plans to release more videos in the future.)

Here are summaries of some of the tapes currently available:

On "William Albert Allard," the photographer discusses color photography and explains how he gains access to people who normally shy away from photographers. Mr. Allard illustrates his comments with photographs he has taken for National Geographic magazine (27 minutes).

The tape "Ernst Haas" is presented as a personal dialogue, covering the photographer's philosophy and technique. "There are a thousand possibilities within a second, and a billion possibilities for where to shoot it," Mr. Haas says on the tape. "For this you need discipline". (49 minutes).

"Sports Photography Today: Sports Illustrated Photographers" covers such topics as how to choose the proper lens. The photographers involved, Rich Clarkson (basketball), Ron Modra (baseball) and John Biever (football), explain the basics of good sports photography — "preparation, attitude, attention and concentration" (35 minutes).

"Brian Lanker: Sharing the Dream," takes viewers on a two-year project — a book about 75 Afro-American women. The tape reveals how Mr. Lanker plans each portrait and shows how he lights and poses his subjects. Mr. Lanker is interviewed on location and provides details on how he obtained financing, in the form of a grant, and how he gained access to his subjects (45 minutes).

"The Precise Image: From Imagination to Reality." Klaus Lucka, a commercial photographer in New York, shoots cigarette, automobile and cosmetic advertising for a living. On this tape he shows how to create special effects, select props and conduct location research (36 minutes).

"Sam Abell: Sight and Insight." Mr. Abell, a photographer for National Geographic, takes viewers on an assignment. In the process, one learns how he translates ideas into pictures (30 minutes).

"Fashion and Beauty: Two Approaches." Ian Miles, tells you how to get tight close-ups of the human face, while Palma Kolansky shows how she obtains dreamy moods in her photographs. "It's important to me that my images evoke a strong response from the viewer," Mr. Miles said. "The important element is impact." Mr. Miles also talks about the importance of the subjects' eyes in photography (29 minutes).

"Mary Ellen Mark: The Searching Eye." The documentary photograper turns her camera on the unvarnished aspects of life. Her assignments are tough and absorbing. Learn how one of our best photographers works (24 minutes).

"The Power of Idea: Professionalism and Marketing in Photography." Howard Chapnick, former president of the Black Star Agency, tells how to develop ideas for photographs, how to shoot them and then how to sell them. To illuminate his points, he uses the work and words of 14 photographers, including Anthony Suau, Sebastio Salgado, Jim Balog and David and Peter Turnley (31 minutes).

"Passport to a Career: The Photographic Portfolio." This tape contains tips and insights for people interested in making a living at photography. It features Rich Clarkson and Chris Johns, a photographer for National Geographic (33 minutes).

Tapes may be purchased at your local camera shop or by calling (800) 532-8457.

Attendance Record In, Yes, Gatlinburg

ATTENDANCE at national championships, measured by the number of tables in play in each session, has roughly quadrupled in the last 30 years. Records have been set at cities that attract tourists, like Anaheim, Calif., Orlando, Fla., and Las Vegas, Nev.

The Summer Nationals is always the most popular event, because players can conveniently devote their vacations to it, and at Las Vegas in 1991 it generated 24,221 tables, or an average of 1,211 per session of play.

Increases have not been comparable, or even appreciable, in tournaments at the local level. But regional tournaments have been growing, sometimes in unexpected places. The biggest regional tournament ever, with 5,100 tables in seven days, ended two weeks ago. It averaged 364 tables a session, more than at the 1985 Fall Nationals.

Very remarkably, this did not happen at a resort offering a Disney park or casinos, nor in a large metropolitan area. It happened in Gatlinburg, Tenn., a Smoky Mountain resort town of 3,417 people. There were many team games, which are now very popular; on the first evening, there were 200 teams in play.

West led the diamond queen.

Two star-studded teams eventually met in the Flight A event and faced the diagramed deal. North and South were Paul Soloway and Eddie Wold, with Sabine Zenkel and Tom Sanders in the East-West seats.

This was a competitive part-score situation, with somebody likely to buy the contract at the three level. North could have chosen to defend three diamonds, which would have been tricky. To defeat the contract, North would have had to maneuver a spade ruff, either by leading that suit originally or by leading the club ace and shifting to spades.

But South's weak jump to two hearts, after the take-out double, promised a six-card suit, so North ventured three hearts. West led the diamond queen, which was won with the ace. South finessed the club jack, but was then in difficulty. He tried to cash the club ace, and East ruffed.

In the face of a threatened cross-ruff, East found the only effective defense: she returned the heart ten, a fine move that apparently — but only apparently — sacrificed a trick. If South had won with the jack, the obvious play, he would have had to lose a spade and three more red-suit tricks, one way or another.

South chose instead to win with dummy's ace and lead a club. This offered some hope of using the clubs, and would have succeeded if East had discarded. South would have ruffed in his hand, ruffed a diamond and ruffed another club. That would have let him cross to the spade ace and throw a loser on an established club.

Instead, East ruffed the club with the heart queen, on which South threw a diamond. East cashed the heart king, cashed a diamond winner and eventually scored the spade king to defeat the contract.

Consider what would have happened if East had played passively, by leading a diamond at the fourth trick. South would have ruffed in the dummy, ruffed a club, ruffed a diamond and ruffed another club. That would set up the clubs to take care of the potential spade loser.

This gained 7 imps for Zenkel's team, since her teammates made three clubs in the replay. They won the battle but lost the war: Their opponents eventually won the title.

ANSWERS

Should Masako Owada Forgo Career to Marry Crown Prince of Japan?

SUSAN BROWNMILLER, feminist and author of "Femininity" (Ballantine, 1984): Maybe she'll have a change of heart. How many ceremonies at Kyoto can you go through? Who knows what she will think in a couple of years?

We all know how unhappy Di has become. There's a tradition, although Queen Sirikit developed a nice life for herself, by doing a lot of charity work.

IVANA M. TRUMP, businesswoman, fashion designer and author: I would not do it. No, I would not do it. You give up everything.

She is a very educated lady, she had higher goals, she went to Europe. There's nothing wrong with marrying a man and taking care of a husband.

But is being an Emperor's wife going to be enough for her? Unless she is going to take an active role, like a Hillary Clinton. Then I find it fine. He can combine her duty to the Emperor and she can take a role in the administration.

But if she's just going to be sitting home and looking at the ceiling and go abroad with her husband — I hope it will be enough for her.

HOPE COOKE, a former queen of Sikkim, author of "Time Change" (Simon and Schuster, 1980) and a self-taught historian: You can't really equate what you would do, and what she would do.

Whether she should or should not give up her job is her decision. The constitution of Japan bars the Emperor from doing anything in politics or religion, whereas the Imperial Family does not come under that ruling. But there is a forum for this woman to make herself felt, because she will be getting ceremonial jobs in social agencies like Unicef, and I think symbols can be powerful forces.

As an example, I use his Holiness the Dalai Lama, who doesn't have a state, but this man emanates enormous force for the good, through his own being. So I think that she, with the different attributes she brings — her education, her international upbringing, her intelligence — would be a force that could serve the good of Japan.

It seems they want these attributes, or they wouldn't want her so badly to marry the Crown Prince. They are going for an image. She should be willing to carry some of the weight.

NAOMI WOLF, author of "The Beauty Myth" (Anchor Books, 1991): She should do whatever she wants. That's what feminism is about.

A Kinder, Gentler Trade Center

Port Authority Stressing Sensitivity to Tenants

By CLAUDIA H. DEUTSCH

SUPERFICIALLY, it's business as usual at the World Trade Center. People throng the concourse and the plaza, going to shops and subways and, of course, to and from work.

Free PATH rides last week from the center increased traffic even more, and center-subsidized sales at stores and restaurants in the complex this coming week will probably bring even more people in.

Tenants, meanwhile, are nearly all back in their offices. And lease negotiations continue apace. BankAmerica just signed a much ballyhooed 15-year lease for eight floors in Tower One, and the law firm of Brown & Wood will soon close on a deal for expansion space in Tower Two.

The flurry of litigation that many expected from tenants trying to get out of leases after the Feb. 26 car bomb explosion closed the towers down doesn't look like it will materialize. In fact, with BankAmerica coming on, the center will be 92 percent occupied, a heady rate for any building in this space-glutted city.

Not at all.

Indeed, the World Trade Center that is emerging from its trauma is a changed place. Some changes are already evident to even the most casual visitor — who will need a pass to get beyond the ground floor. Others are in the offing: the center's physical plant, state-of-the-art when the buildings opened in the early 1970's, is about to go through an accelerated overhaul.

But perhaps the most dramatic changes of all will be impossible to see, though easy for tenants to feel: the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, the center's owner, is finally dealing with the rampant dissatisfaction with services and maintenance that have plagued the Twin Towers for years.

"We were already upgrading the physical systems and customer service when the blast happened," said

Staten Island, Too

'Landmarks' Reaches Out

Everyone knows that the Landmarks Preservation Commission takes in Manhattan, but a new exhibition opening Tuesday at Federal Hall tries to show that the commission increasingly takes in the Bronx and Staten Island, too — as well as Brooklyn and Queens.

The exhibition of photographs, text and architectural artifacts, entitled "Reaching Out: The Landmarks Commission 1990-1993," was created to celebrate National Preservation Week. It features the restoration of the red, blue and yellow Parachute Jump at Coney Island, Astor Row in Harlem, the adaptive reuse of old store and loft buildings in SoHo, and the construction on a vacant lot at 27 Tompkins Place in Brooklyn of a house reminiscent of the mid-19th-century Greek Revival rowhouses that occupy the rest of the block.

The show runs through June 10, after which it will tour other parts of the city, including Fort Totten in Queens. Federal Hall is at 26 Wall Street in downtown Manhattan. The exhibition is open weekdays from 9 A.M. to 5 P.M. Admission is free. Information: (212) 264-8711.

'Get the Lead Out'

How to Cope With the Peril Of Poisoning

When staff members of the New York Public Interest Research Group, a nonprofit civic organization, began looking into the issue of lead poisoning last year, they hoped to find a book that would offer a concise overview of the problem.

They couldn't find such a thing. So they produced one themselves. "Get the Lead Out," a 54-page book by Catherine McVay Hughes and Chris Meyer, was published last week.

As many as three-quarters of American homes built before 1980 may have some lead, the book says. It goes on to discuss how lead enters the body, where it can be found (painted surfaces, pipes, faucets, soil and furniture, among other places), how to test for it and how to eliminate it.

Home inspection tips are given: "Any surface that a child can get at and chew on is one to look out for. One common surface is the windowsill that a baby may teethe on." Lead abatement measures are discussed. There is a list of 15 suggestions for dealing with lead-removal contractors and a list of New York laboratories that have been certified to test for lead in paint and drinking water.

Dr. John F. Rosen, professor of pediatrics and director of the lead-poisoning program at Montefiore Medical Center in the Bronx, reviewed the first draft of the book. "Its value is considerable," he said, "in that, at least for lay people, it pullstogether a good deal of background information about sources of lead, health effects of lead and recent recommendations of the Centers for Disease Control. And it does provide the names and addresses of helpful resources."

The book may be obtained through Nypirg Publications, 9 Murray Street, 3d floor, New York, N.Y. 10007, or by phoning (212) 349-6460. Copies are $6 for individuals or $12 for corporations and agencies, plus $1 for shipping and handling.

A drawing of the $3.1 million Aerospace Training Facility.

Taking Wing on Long Island

Aerospace Training For the Fledglings

It doesn't fly, but it looks like it might. Among its features is a 200-foot-long curved roof that resembles the wing of an airplane — which is perfectly appropriate, considering its use. It's the design for the new $3.1 million, 20,000-square-foot Aerospace Training Facility being constructed at Republic Airport on Long Island for the aviation program at the State University College of Technology at Farmingdale.

Designed by Siris/Coombs Architects of Manhattan, the building is to be two miles from the main campus. It is to include an airplane maintenance hangar, electrical fabrication and engine laboratories, classrooms, administrative offices, a flight simulation lab and a flight control and navigation center, all organized around a central skylighted court that will function as a student lounge and lobby.

The school has offered associate degrees in aviation since 1946. Starting in September it will offer Bachelor of Science degrees in aviation management and professional piloting. The building is to open in September 1994.

Free Mortgage Insurance

Dime Offers a Special, but Just for May

In this economy, anyone who loses a job has a bucket of things to worry about. Those who apply for a mortgage at the Dime Savings Bank of New York this month can eliminate one: Meeting their mortgage payments, at least for the short term.

Until June 1, the Dime is covering new mortgagees under an insurance policy that will pick up three months of mortgage payments, up to $3,500 a month, if they lose their job within six months after their loan closes.

"Our surveys show that job insecurity is one of the greatest barriers to purchasing a home," said David J. Totaro, the Dime's chief marketing officer.

"This can give people a little more confidence," he added.

Of course, there are restrictions. The policy does not apply to self-employed people, those in their family's business, or those who hold more than a quarter of their company's stock.

As soon as the Great American Insurance Group, which is writing the policy, gets state approval to sell it permanently, the Dime will offer various forms of mortgage insurance to all its mortgagees, for premiums of 2 to 5 percent of monthly payments.

Your Home:
Reverse Mortgage

Options Widen Appeal

By ANDRÉE BROOKS

OLDER homeowners who might have dismissed the benefits of a reverse equity mortgage in the past should take a fresh look. An extended range of options, tailoring the opportunity more directly to the needs of the particular borrower, are transforming these loans into a more appealing deal for a lot more people.

A reverse equity mortgage pays a homeowner a fixed monthly sum, drawn from the capital locked up in the home. The amount is based on the existing equity in the property, the current value of the home and the age of the borrower.

Monthly payments can therefore vary dramatically — from a low of $300 a month to $1,000 or more. In some instances a lump sum or line of credit may be substituted for the monthly payout or can be provided as an auxiliary option.

Muriel Courchesne, 80, of Centerreach, L.I., for example, chose a $60,000 lump sum because all she really needed, she said, was to "pay off some bills and fix up the house."

When the owner dies or relocates, the total amount paid out, plus interest charges and servicing fees, is deducted by the lender from the proceeds of the sale.

The idea, around for more than a decade, began to gain momentum only in the last three years. Before then, most lenders were reluctant to get involved for fear the older person might outlive the equity value. Borrowers, for their part, feared the money might dry up if the lender went bankrupt.

Those fears abated in 1988 when the Department of Housing and Urban Development offered, on an experimental basis, to insure 2,500 of these loans, a figure recently raised to 25,000. And the Federal National Mortgage Association, a federally chartered mortgage purchasing agency, also began buying the loans from local lenders, further lessening the risks for all concerned.

As a result, the number of lenders offering reverse mortgages has gone from a few dozen in the mid-80's to more than 100 in 40 states today, according to the American Association of Retired Persons. Co-op owners are still excluded, however, because they own shares rather than real property.

The mortgages now come in dozens of flavors, as it were, rather than plain vanilla. Just a few weeks ago, for example, Transamerica HomeFirst, a subsidiary of Transamerica Corporation, the financial services company, together with the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company (Metlife), offered a reverse mortgage that will let the homeowner continue to get payments even after the home is sold — so-called "portable" benefits.

This is done by charging the homeowner a one-time premium of around $15,000 at the time the mortgage is taken out. No actual cash is needed, however, since the sum is added to the deductions a reverse mortgage holder eventually has taken out of the proceeds of the sale of the home.

This new program is available only in California but is to be offered elsewhere by year-end. Anyone interested in being notified when it becomes available should write: Transamerica HomeFirst, 2 Transamerica Center, 505 Sansome Street, San Francisco, Calif. 94111. Or call (800) 538-5569.

Other plans are also improving. Most now offer at least five types: relatively high monthly payments paid only for a defined period, say 5 or 10 years; slightly lower monthly payments that last as long the homeowner remains in the home; a line of credit that can be drawn upon as needed; a combination of a line of credit coupled with reduced monthly payments for a defined period; a line of credit plus even smaller monthly payments for an indefinite period.

Other variations are also out there. The Connecticut Housing Finance Authority has been offering a payment plan adjusted for a predetermined level of inflation — something one couple who are among its borrowers, Fred and Muriel Guite of Berlin, Conn., say has been especially useful. The 83-year-old couple started two years ago with payments of $1,400 a month and now get over $1,500. "It helps cover our medical premiums," said Mrs. Guite, "which are always going up."

THE Connecticut plan lets participants modify their contracts from a 10-year schedule of payments to a 5-year schedule, should a larger monthly income suddenly be needed, say, for medical expenses or home nursing.

Other plans will advance a lump sum at the start of the program to pay off any remaining mortgage balance before the reverse mortgage payments kick in.

Ideally, although counseling by a specialist on aging is normally provided, the potential applicant should first do some background reading and get a full list of area lenders. The American Association of Retired Persons, for example, offers a free 47-page consumer guide, "Home-Made Money," along with a list of over 100 reverse mortgage lenders. To

Penn's Racing to Join Clubhouse Row

By PETER SLATIN

FOR determined University of Pennsylvania alumni seeking to keep pace with other Ivy League schools that have long had snug harbors in New York City, there is no place like Clubhouse Row, the stretch of 43d and 44th Streets between Vanderbilt Avenue and the Avenue of Americas.

"We wanted to be near the theater district," said Lynne Tarnopol, co-chair of the Penn Club committee. "We also wanted to be near Grand Central and near the other university clubs."

When it opens next spring, the new Penn Club — in a building built in 1900 at 30 West 44th Street for the Yale Club — will join the Harvard Club, across the street at No. 27 since 1893; the Yale Club, which moved to 50 Vanderbilt Avenue in 1915 after 15 years in its previous location, and the Princeton Club, around the corner at 15 West 43d since 1963.

Hoping to attract 10,000 members in its first two years, Penn is raising $25 million to renovate and expand, from 11 stories to 14, the Beaux-Arts building with neo-classical overtones designed by Tracy & Swartwout, whose principals left McKim, Mead & White to form their own firm.

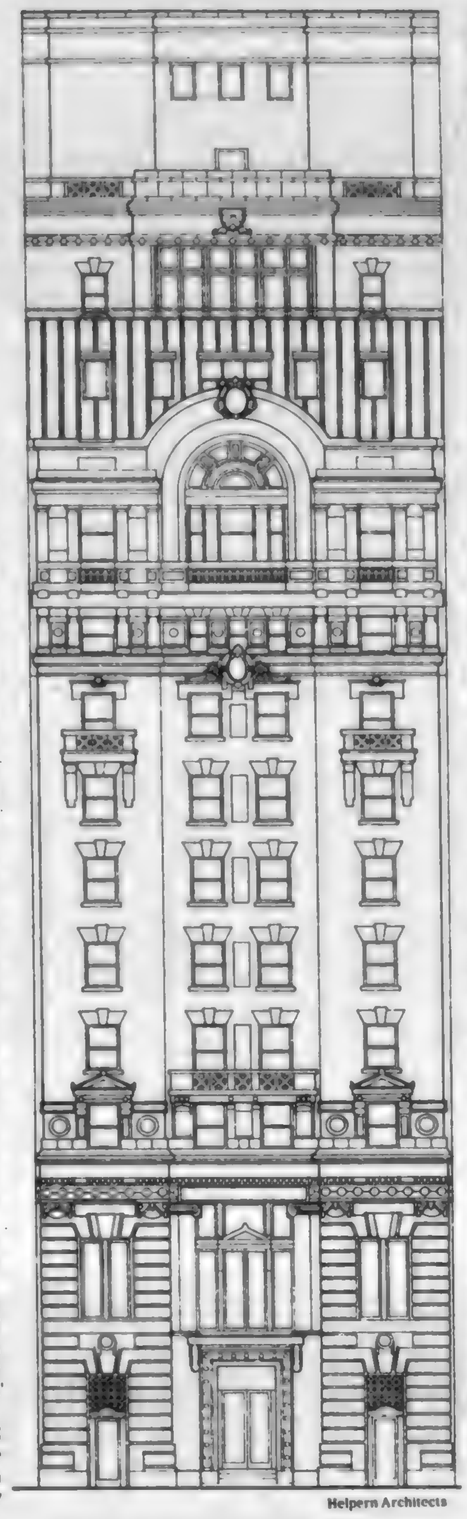
The other Ivy League newcomer to club ownership in town, the Cornell Club, opened at 6 East 44th Street three and a half years ago. Cornell, too, sought out the district for its clubhouse, installing it in the Chicago Pneumatic Corporation building, which it bought in 1986 for more than $10 million. It spent $22 million overhauling the building and adding four stories to its ten.

Though neither club had owned its own quarters before, they share a surprisingly prescient provenance. Founded in 1889, the Cornell Club bounced around different Manhattan locations for a century before finally having a home of its own, a block from the Royalton Hotel, where it rented rooms in 1900, the same year the Penn Club rented space in that hotel.

"Cornell already had a large presence in New York with the Medical Center, the School of Industrial and Labor Relations and approximately 25,000 alumni in the area," said Thomas Inglis, the club's general manager (and a graduate of Cornell's Hotel and Restaurant School.) "Many of them felt it was important to have a prominent place in Manhattan, a presence."

For both Penn and Cornell, the expense and effort of having that presence on these unassuming but power-packed blocks — which also are home to the New York Yacht Club, the Association of the Bar of the City of New York and the Century Club — is an investment with incalculable returns not only in image-boosting but also in cementing the ties that bind future endowments.

"These alumni are intensely loyal," said Walter A. Hunt Jr., an architect and vice president at Gensler & Associates, the firm that renovated the Cornell Club, "and they have an incredible ability to raise money. The subliminal purpose of the clubs is to do just that."



Helpern Architects

Jack Manning/The New York Times

The Penn Club will join other Ivy Leaguers on Clubhouse Row. A rendering depicts the finished facade at 30 West 44th Street.

"We have lost a lot of alumni because there's no meeting place for them," said Mrs. Tarnapol. "Now we are focusing on the younger alumni, who will be using the club the most."

The desire to establish a fruitful link with the past, one their neighbors have long been able to exploit, could also hold pitfalls that the older clubs are either immune to or better equipped to cope with.

"Harvard, Princeton and Yale have experienced a decline in activity of between 5 and 15 percent," said Bjorn Hanson, hospitality industry chairman of Coopers & Lybrand. "That is not really threatening to their financial picture. But because Cornell and Penn have higher debt costs and project costs than the established clubs, they are in a different situation."

The older clubs are owned outright by their members, rather than being developed by the universities themselves, as is the case with Cornell and Penn.

"Fortunately, both clubs are backed by the universities, and have deep pockets behind them," Mr. Hanson said. "It's very hard to pre-sell memberships. They are a discretionary item, with little incentive to join before the doors open."

Dues vary widely, with categories like resident, suburban and student. Cornell's range from $150 to $715 a year; Harvard's and Yale's are somewhat higher and Penn's, which have not been set yet, are expected to be comparable.

Building a club is somewhat like creating an amalgam of manor house and luxury hotel, and as trustees and architects struggle to fit all the desired programs into the allotted space, one result can be substantial overruns in construction costs. It's unlikely, says one analyst, who declined to be identified, that a building like the current 21-story Yale Club, with 140 guest rooms, as opposed to Cornell's 48 and Penn's 39, could be financed today.

"THE building was too small for the original program, and every alumni sector wanted more," said Mr. Hunt, whose firm designed Cornell's reworking of Chicago Pneumatic's rundown premises. He called the property "a good period piece, with classic stone-framed windows."

"We had to compromise on the quantity of programmed space, but we were able to establish a traditional club look and a sense of place," he said.

The former Yale Club building had been occupied since the early 1970's by Touro College, which sold it to Penn in 1989 for $15 million. David P. Helpern, the Manhattan architect hired to renovate the club and add two floors, said that he had found "nothing reusable" but that it had "a wonderful, wonderful facade."

The limestone and brick cladding, he said, "are much closer to the Penn campus than to Yale's" and "we wanted to be as authentic as possible."

With the aid of the interior designers Bennett and Judie Weinstock, a husband-and-wife team from Philadelphia, who are Penn alumni, Mr. Helpern's firm converted the former ground floor grill room into a living room/library, putting a new grill room in the basement and installing a double-height dining room seating 130 on the second floor. A smaller banquet room on the 10th floor, also two stories high, looks out of the facade's huge arched terra cotta-trimmed window.

One touch that the club's trustees are eagerly anticipating is the recreation in the grill room of Maxfield Parrish's "Old King Cole" mural, the original of which is at the Mask and Wig, the university's theatrical club, with another at the St. Regis Hotel.

"It's very clubby, but we don't want to over Red-and-Blue the interior," said Mrs. Tarnopol, alluding to the school's colors.

The building was "the minimum size Penn could have bought for their club," said Mr.

A Different Kind of Lift for a Ski Resort

By ELIN BARD

TETON VILLAGE, WYO.

LAST July, two men with strong ties to Wyoming took over the long-languishing 2,500-acre Jackson Hole Ski Resort with visions of making it one of the nation's leading winter destinations.

Ten months after buying the controlling interest in Ski Corporation, which owns the resort, John L. Kemmerer 3d and John Resor are still drawing up plans that they will present to Teton County officials.

On Rendezvous Mountain, they expect to develop new terrain, add high-speed quad lifts and build a restaurant. Off the mountain in Teton Village, they want to build at least one restaurant, shopping facilities, condominiums and a hotel.

The Ski Corporation property — the mountain and its 62 ski trails and 9 lifts — has no hotel or condominiums.

The new owners hope to submit their plans by early fall. But it will be 1994 at best before they can get all their approvals, including those by Federal agencies, among them the National Forest Service at Bridger-Teton National Forest, which leases out the property for private use on a long-term basis.

Whatever their success, the effort itself is a major step forward for the resort, whose growth had been all but halted by a five-year legal dispute between the former owners.

Mr. Kemmerer, 46, chairman of Kemmerer Resources Corporation, a family investment company, formed HJ Ski Management and the family acquired an 80 percent interest in Ski Corporation, the owner of the Jackson Hole Ski Resort.

The man behind the deal, 43-year-old Mr. Resor, whose family is the largest land owner in Teton County, received an undisclosed amount of stock at the closing. Mr. Resor is now president of Ski Corporation and HJ Management and Mr. Kemmerer — whose family holds 80 percent of the stock — is chairman and chief executive.

Jackson Hole is named after Davey Jackson, a fur trapper of the 1880's. The "hole" is the trapper's term for a high mountain valley. The town is called Jackson while Jackson Hole is the entire 60-by-20-mile valley, from the south entrance of Yellowstone National Park to Grand Teton National Park in northwestern Wyoming.

The area is acknowledged to be one of the most scenic in the country and rich in indigenous wildlife, including 10,000 protected wapitis, the largest American deer.
Rendezvous Mountain's vertical drop, 4,139 feet, is the highest in the continental United States. Its terrain is considered one of the most challenging in the world and draws about 400,000 skiers a year.

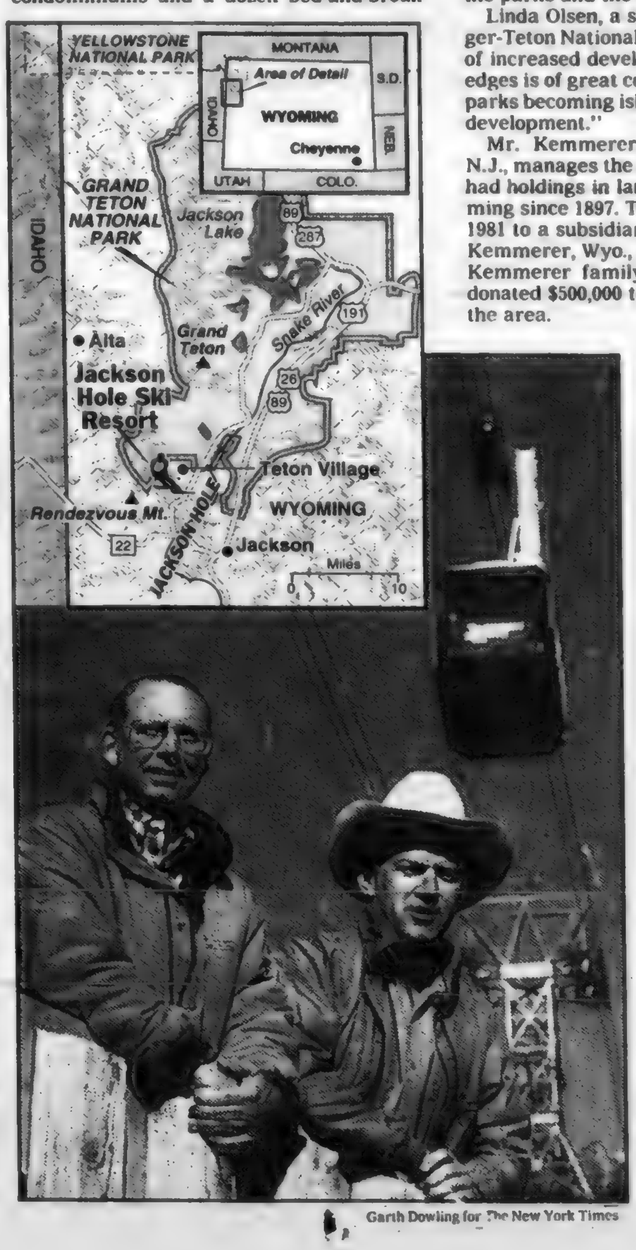
Summer or winter, Jackson Hole has been a destination for those seeking panoramic views and the experience of the Western wilderness since 1919, when local cowboys opened the area's first dude ranches.

The airport, which did not provide direct flights to Jackson until 1986, is five miles outside of town on a leased 50-acre parcel in a national park. It cannot be enlarged.

Apart from camping sites, Teton County has about 8,100 beds and more than 70 restaurants. Teton Village, at the base of the Ski Corporation Resort, has 300 motel rooms, 216 condominiums and a dozen bed-and-breakfast accommodations.

With wooden sidewalks, the nearby town of Jackson is reminiscent of the Old West. Its square park, once the center of a fort, has elkhorn arches at each corner. But in both communites the stores are stores, not boutiques, as in Aspen and Vail, Colo.

But this has not been enough to make the Jackson Hole Ski Resort competitive.



Garth Dowling for The New York Times

John L. Kemmerer 3d, left, and John Resor have drafted proposals for their 2,500-acre Jackson Hole Ski Resort in Wyoming calling for the construction of two restaurants, condominiums, a hotel and shops to supplement facilities in Teton Village.

MR. KEMMERER and Mr. Resor are under no illusions about being able to achieve their goals quickly. It will take capital, planning and agreements between the new owners, locals who own and lease property at the base of the mountain, the parks and the environmental agencies.

Linda Olsen, a spokeswoman for the Bridger-Teton National Park said: "The pressure of increased development around the park's edges is of great concern. We do not want the parks becoming islands surrounded by urban development."

Mr. Kemmerer, who lives in Chatham, N.J., manages the assets of a family that has had holdings in land and coal mines in Wyoming since 1897. These holdings were sold in 1981 to a subsidiary of Gulf Oil. The town of Kemmerer, Wyo., still gets benefits from the Kemmerer family. This spring the family donated $500,000 to a fund to aid students in the area.

Mr. Resor's family owns 7,000 acres, including the Snake River Ranch, which virtually surrounds Teton Village. The family, along with two others, the Hagues and the Laughlins, owns the Snake River Association, which is currently discussing with Ski Corporation a possible 50-50 joint venture to develop the land at the base of the resort.

The resort's success will depend on convincing property owners at the base of the mountain to agree to changes.

"We're not going to improve the mountain unless we're sure we can get improvements at the base," Mr. Resor said. "Balance is the key."

Ski Corporation has proposed moving the existing parking lot across Teton Village Road onto Snake River Associates property so that it can devote its full 21 acres to its car-free complex at the base of the mountain.

For the last two years, the Teton County Planning Board has been working on a new master plan for growth and is expected to look into the possibility of commercial development of the Snake River property.

Two informal talks have taken place between the corporation and the planning board. Both parties have agreed to propose ways to maintain open spaces, address the need for affordable housing for local workers and consider population density, waste management and ways to guarantee Jackson Hole's quality of life.

COUNTY COMMISSIONER Steve Thomas said the new master plan would require a minimum residential lot of 30, or perhaps 35, acres for a house of no more than 10,000 square feet.

"It will increase real estate prices, but it's population control and maintaining open spaces that are wanted now." Mr. Thomas said.

Ninety-eight percent of the land in Jackson Hole is owned or controlled through leases by the Government. Of the private land, once owned almost exclusively by ranchers, 24 percent is now owned by people who have built vacation homes.

"What has happened," said Miss Olsen, the Bridger spokeswoman, "is that the ranchers today are barely eking out a living while sitting on land whose value is perhaps $15 million."

The legal battle that was waged by 67-year-old Paul McCollister, the founder of Ski Corporation, and John Deuss, a Dutch oil investor, was over a $3.6 million investment made by Mr. Deuss in exchange for a 24 percent interest in the ski area's operations. This was complicated by Mr. McCollister's debt to Merck-Finck, a German bank.

As the dispute continued, Mr. Resor pursued Mr. McCollister and later Mr. Deuss for two and a half years. Ultimately the Kemmerer family, through the HJ Management Company, made up of two trusts and one partnership headed by Mr. Kemmerer, purchased all the stock held by Mr. McCollister and Mr. Deuss.

The new entity also settled the company's outstanding debts. It was a cash deal, Mr. Resor said, for an amount "between $17 million and $20 million." ■

CORRECTION

An article on March 14 about the Eexcel Apartments in Los Angeles misidentified the lender who provided a mortgage on the property. The lender was ITT Federal Bank. A bank official brought the error to the writer's attention; this correction was delayed through a misunderstanding about who would notify the editors.

A Nature Center Blooms in Central Park Woodlands

By SHAWN G. KENNEDY

NOW surrounded by the tender green that trees are wearing these days, a picturesque structure is nearing completion at the northeast corner of Central Park at the edge of Harlem.

Scheduled to be opened to the public in September, the new building will be a place where visitors can learn about this most rustic section of the park before exploring its woodlands, bluffs, streams and archeological sites. It will be the first completely new structure to rise in Central Park since the children's zoo opened in 1960.

To be known formally as the Charles A. Dana Discovery Center — the Charles A. Dana Foundation, a New York philanthropic group that gives science and education grants, together with the Central Park Women's Committee paid most of the project's $1.8 million cost — the facility is the structural centerpiece of an ambitious $25 million refurbishing of the park's badly neglected north end.

The project is the ongoing undertaking of the city, through the Department of Parks and Recreation, and the Central Park Conservancy, a 13-year-old nonprofit public/private partnership.

Already completed is the clearing, cleaning and replanting of the North Woods, more than 200 acres above 96th Street. The Harlem Meer, dredged three years ago for restoration and redesign, will reopen in June with a softer, more natural shoreline and new wetland plantings. Also nearing completion is a terrace and esplanade at the north end of the meer that will serve as resting place, performance space and outdoor classroom for the Discovery Center.

Delayed, but not abandoned, the Conservancy says, is the Harlem Meer Boathouse Restaurant that was to be a companion structure to the Discovery Center. The restaurant was put on hold after financing for the $6 million project fell through. Instead, three food concessions — two carts and a snack stand — will open this summer.

Andrea Mohin/The New York Times

WHEN the Discovery Center opens in September, visitors will find a familiar silhouette. Samuel G. White, a partner in the architectural firm of Buttrick White & Burtis, which designed the center, said that the Dairy near the 65th Street Transverse was the main point of reference for both the Victorian architectural style and the color scheme of the new building.

"We have taken elements common to architecture of the late 1860's when Olmsted and Vaux designed the park," said Mr. White, referring to the park's architects, Frederick Law Olmsted and Calvert Vaux.

The building's color scheme of subdued gray to green and mauve to purple is even reflected in the brick of its base, which has a purple cast to its red color.

Inside, the center's reception area has been designed to resemble a forest ranger's lodge. The design of the classrooms and laboratory upstairs reflect the planners' informal, even whimsical, approach to teaching natural science. Part of the design in the tile floor of one classroom, for example, will have an environmental time line showing how natural occurrences and human actions have affected the environment.

Rather than the traditional fixed display cases, the center's exhibits will be installed in steamer trunks characteristic of turn-of-the-century travel. Designed by Edwin Schlossberg Inc., the six-foot-tall trunks, with brass fixtures and leather trim, will have compartments and drawers displaying natural science or history items of interest.

Weekdays the center will offer education programs for school classes and youth groups; on the weekends and in the evenings the center will be open to the public.

Cheryl Best, director of education for the Conservancy, said the center's displays and features had been designed to introduce New Yorkers to their natural environment.

"NATURE is often seen by New Yorkers as something outside and apart from the city," she said, "something you have to go somewhere else to find. We want to show that the park and its natural features are part of the urban experience and can be experienced that way."

In addition to the study of the park's natural habitat, some educational programs will emphasize water and woodland ecology and land-use management.

"We also want to foster a sense of civic stewardship of the park," said Ms. Best. "We want residents and visitors to feel that the park is theirs to enjoy and to maintain and preserve."

While the comparative isolation and wilderness of the North Woods is cherished by some, its secluded paths and lack of use make it forbidding to many. Timothy Marshall, first deputy administrator for Central Park, said that with the opening of the Discovery Center and restoration projects it washoped that use of the north end would increase substantially.

"Our objective is not to turn the north end into the same sort of activity center that exists in the south end of the park," Mr. Marshall said. "We want the north end to remain a quiet, more rustic space. But we also hope that people who come to Central Park for features like the lake, children's zoo and carousel will come uptown. Increased use of the entire park will make it safer and reduce vandalism."

Security improvements already in place include increased police patrols, wider pedestrian paths for easier access by official vehicles and the installation of emergency call boxes. Another part of the campaign to increase use of the north end has been the Conservancy's outreach to the park's neighbors in Harlem, East Harlem and the Upper West and East Sides.

The New York Times

"We don't want the park to function in isolation," said Erana M. Stennett, director of government and community relations for Central Park. "We found that many people who live in the neighborhoods near the north end of the park did not really feel that Central Park was their park. We have been trying to change that."

For the last few years the Conservancy and the Parks Department have worked with community boards to bring children and high school students into the park for after-school and weekend recreational and volunteer programs. And community task forces have been formed to assist with park maintenance and restoration programs.

In addition, the Conservancy is helping train nearby resident volunteers in graffiti removal and street tree care. ■

Plainfield

By JERRY CHESLOW

WITH nine districts on the National Register of Historic Places, this Union County city probably has New Jersey's most diverse housing stock.

Stately turretted Queen Annes stand next to Second Empires with mansard roofs and Italianate houses on broad lawns. Most of these large homes were built by turn-of the century businessmen who moved their families to the suburbs and commuted by rail to New York City.

The housing stock, which also includes post-World War II Capes, split levels, colonials and ranches, is for sale at bargain prices because of the residual effects of race riots in the late 1960's. Although some neighborhoods, such as the Sleepy Hollow area on the east side of town, with its winding, tree-lined streets and large, custom houses, remain well-manicured, many formerly gracious streets near the center of town, like West Fourth, are blighted, with boarded-up buildings and shards of auto glass on the streets.

Prices range from about $50,000 for a small two-bedroom colonial on a narrow lot to $550,000 for houses with up to eight bedrooms, four baths and four fireplaces on one to three acres on the east side.

"Dollar for dollar, you can't buy what you can buy here anywhere else in the state," said Aaron Campbell, an associate at Century 21 John C. Campbell Realty. "For instance, I just sold a four-bedroom house with a nice fireplace, right near a park, for $136,000."

Mr. Campbell said that he also recently sold a small colonial on McCrea Street on the west side of town for $55,000. Two-family houses near the center of the city go for $90,000 to $125,000.

Most apartment houses are on West Seventh and West Eighth Streets. There are also many apartments in large Victorian homes that have been converted to multifamily dwellings. One-bedroom apartments rent for $500 to $600 a month, with two bedrooms renting for about $100 more and three going for up to $1,000.

One of the residents of the Crescent Hill Historic District is Theodore U. Horger, vice chairman of the Historical Preservation Commission. An engineer at A.T.& T. in nearby Basking Ridge, Mr. Horger owns an 1877 Italianate house and says he enjoys the feeling of living with history and a diverse population.

"My main complaint is the business district," he says. "I would like to see it revitalized."

That district, around Front Street and Park Avenue, has two supermarkets and the usual mix of video stores, banks and small department stores. The largest store in town, Macy's, is boarded up, as are several smaller ones.

Mayor Harold W. Mitchell said he hoped to bring the business district back through a series of incentives, most important of which is the state designation of the area as an Enterprise Zone. This lets store owners collect a 3 percent state sales tax, as opposed to the normal 6 percent. Much of the tax revenue is returned to the city by the state for special capital improvements. Last year, Plainfield used $300,000 of those funds to convert a vacant lot into a downtown park.

"THE city is turning around," said Mayor Mitchell. "We in City Hall have started working with the real estate community, the parents, the schools — everyone we can who is involved in the system — to try and make this a better place."

He has also instituted community policing in problem areas and a residency requirement for all municipal employees, a policy that he says made the civil service more stable.

For a small city, Plainfield has a large variety of good, moderately priced restaurants, like Caruso's on South Avenue, with an Italian menu, Freshwaters on Fourth Street, which serves soul food, and Lilly Greenleaves on East Front Street, with an American menu. There are also Jamaican, Colombian and kosher restaurants.

Among the newer residents are Dr. Thomas H. Brown, president of Union County College, and his wife Tressa, a supervisor in the Plainfield Public School District. Two years ago, they moved from Utica, N.Y., after buying a 1914 five-bedroom center-hall colonial on Evergreen Avenue near the city center.

"We just fell in love with the architecture of the city," said Dr. Brown.

Dr. Brown has also contributed toward the renewal of the city by overseeing the revitalization of the Plainfield campus of the college on Church Street, which was shut down in 1990 for a two-year reconstruction. When it reopened last fall, the student body increased from 250 in 1990 to more than 1,000 today.

"We're already seeing a trend near the campus," Dr. Brown said. "Apartment building owners are installing new windows and several new businesses — a deli, a bakery and others — have opened to cater to the students."

Although 26 percent of the city's population is white, they make up only 1.5 percent of the 6,700-student Plainfield School District. Superintendent of Schools Dr. Annette Kearney said most of the white school-age children attended private schools in neighboring towns. Dr. Kearney terms this apparent lack of confidence in the system "unfortunate."

She conceded that there were "challenges" facing the school system, including teen-age pregnancies and drugs, that force the faculty to do frequent locker sweeps. However, she said that Plainfield's schools provided a good education and sent 55 percent of their graduates on to higher education; last year a Plainfield High student scored 1540 out of a possible 1600 on the Scholastic Aptitude Tests, which are used by colleges to evaluate potential students.

"OVER the past year," she said, "we saw a slight rise in the number of white students in the schools. Perhaps that's because of the recession and the rising tuition in private schools. We hope that it is the beginning of a trend."

The Plainfield School District has 10 K-6 elementary schools, the largest of which is the 612-student Emerson School on Emerson Street. There are two middle schools, which send graduates on to Plainfield High on Park Avenue, and a special education school and an alternative school with programs to keep students from dropping out.

There are two K-8 private schools, the nonsectarian Wardlaw-Hartridge School and the Roman Catholic Holy Family School.

Plainfield traces its roots to 1684, when Thomas Gordon, a Scot from Perth Amboy, became the first settler to build a bark house, with the help of the Leni Lenape Indians, along what came to be known as Cedar Brook. Front Street was part of an Indian trail that connected the Hudson and Delaware Rivers. Until the early 19th century, when the construction of mills attracted workers, it remained a sparsely populated farming community.

ACCORDING to town histories, the first regular passenger service to New York City was the Swift Shore Line, a combination stagecoach to Elizabeth and steamboat to Manhattan. The growing population attracted the Elizabethtown and Somerville Railroad in 1837 and, in 1849, the Central Railroad of New Jersey established a direct connection to New York City, opening the area to commuters and setting off a development boom.

From 1835 to 1869 the population increased more than 11-fold, from 1,030 to 12,000.

Among Plainfield's many historic buildings on the National Register is Drake House on West Front Street. Built in stages starting in 1746, it now houses the Historical Society of Plainfield and the Drake House Museum, with its collection of period furniture. It is open on Saturdays from 2 to 4 P.M.

City Hall, a 1915 Georgian-style brick building with large stone pilasters, is also on the National Register, as is St. Mary's Roman Catholic Church, a Victorian Gothic brick structure on Liberty Street.

In all, the city has 253 acres of parkland. The most widely used park is the 86-acre Cedar Brook Park, off Rose Street, which has two softball diamonds, one baseball diamond, four tennis courts, field hockey and football fields and picnic areas. ■

Q and A

Combining Apartments

Question: I have a 15-year mortgage on a studio in a Manhattan high-rise and I want to buy the studio next to mine and make a small access doorway through, living in both apartments. The extra bathroom will be welcome; the extra kitchen is no problem since I want to use the cabinets for storage.

I am having, however, great trouble getting a mortgage since banks that would otherwise give me one are saying that they do not give mortgages on second homes in the same state. They say that they feel I would want to use the second apartment as an income property, which is not the case. They also said that even getting a commitment from the board giving me permission to break through might not help, as the stock share certificate would still be separate.

Is there anything I can do to convince the banks that I will indeed live in both apartments? ... Nancy Shear, Manhattan

Answer: Yes. According to Marc Luxemburg, a Manhattan lawyer and president of the Council of New York Cooperatives, ask the co-op to combine the shares of the two units into one certificate. Be aware, though, that the combined total of shares may be higher than the two units counted separately because of the wall space being removed. The wall belongs to the co-op, not to any tenant. "This should be helpful in convincing the bank that it is one residence," he said.

Mr. Luxemburg also recommended going back to your original lender. He added, though, that there might be other unstated reasons for their reluctance. For example, many banks these days are not making loans on studio co-ops, which is what you would be buying.

Unequal Treatment

Question: On my mother's death, my sister and I inherited a 3½-room co-op in Whitestone, Queens. Because my mother bought the apartment at the height of the inflated market we expect to sustain a tremendous loss if and when we can sell it. Moreover, shareholders who bought before 1990, as our mother did, are bound by an agreement to a minimum selling price of $62,100, 40 percent of which goes to the co-op.

But due to a new selling policy now in effect shareholders who buy the same 3½-room apartment after 1990 are allowed a 100 percent return on their minimum price. They must also split the gross profit or give the corporation a minimum of $4,000.

We have learned through lawyers that this issue of unequal treatment of shareholders has come before the courts, which have held it to be illegal under New York State law. Our board, however, says that this does not apply to them. We want to fight this but we do not want to go to court. Is there anything we can do? ... Josephine Curcio, Whitestone, Queens

Answer: Probably not. According to Fred L. Seeman, a Manhattan lawyer, the general theme in New York law is indeed that all shareholders have to be treated equally. But you will have to check the co-op's bylaws and amendments to see how and why two different classes of shares have been created, which is, essentially, what you have described. A lawyer's help will be necessary for this, according to Mr. Seeman.

Rating School Districts

Question: In reviewing ads for homes I often see the school district listed as a selling point. I recognize the importance of a good school district, but who is the authority or agency that rates school districts? How can I obtain the ratings for school districts on Long Island? Are they published anywhere? ... David A. Zinn, Manhattan

Answer: Yes. Send $9 to the New York Department of Education, Fiscal Analysis and Services Unit, Education Building, Room 216, Albany, N.Y., 12234 (518 474-8073). Request the most recent edition of the annual two-volume study, "State Profiles of the Education System" and "Statistical Profile of the Public School Districts." The latter volume discusses in detail the demographics of each of the state's school districts as well as other information like enrollment patterns, finances, how many students graduate and how many go on to higher education.

Streetscapes: Williamsburg Houses

A $35 Million Fix For a 1938 Complex

By CHRISTOPHER GRAY

IT was one of the triumphal moments of modernism in New York: 12 city blocks of decrepit slums rebuilt into three superblocks of International Style housing.

But although Brooklyn's 1938 Williamsburg Houses did deliver on its promise of a new order of clean cities and factory-style garden apartments, it skipped established lessons of basic construction, and now the New York City Housing Authority is spending $35 million to repair the damage.

In 1936, under the direction of the Federal Public Works Administration, the city's Housing Authority began a giant complex of four-story buildings on a site in Williamsburg bounded by Bushwick Avenue and Leonard, Maujer and Scholes Streets. Selecting an architect involved accepting or repudiating modernism, a subject of bitter dispute in the architectural profession.

William Lescaze, a Swiss émigré and exponent of modernism, was chosen to head the architectural team and the resulting design was the first demonstration in the United States of the modern style in mass housing.

Instead of buildings in a long perimeter around a central garden court — the approach used in the same year at the authority's Harlem River Houses — the Williamsburg project was divided into 20 separate structures of staggered design and arrangement set at a slight angle to the street and surrounded by grass and playgrounds.

The concrete floor slabs were brought out and made part of the facades. The metal windows, plain brick walls and spare detailing gave the project a definite industrial air. Tenants for the 1,622 units were chosen for job stability and whether their current housing had been built before 1900.

Williamsburg Houses does make a striking and impressive statement against its surroundings of still-decaying wooden houses and walk-up tenements. But two leading critics of the period were not uniformly pleased. Lewis Mumford, writing in The New Yorker under the headline "The New Order," called the architect's contention that the odd angle increased the amount of sunlight "a little silly" and noted that the irregular building outline reduced that advantage.

Talbot Hamlin, writing in Pencil Points, said Williamsburg Houses was "a place where children would be glad to grow up," with landscaping, light, air and planning "better than the most expensive apartments of Park Avenue." But he also criticized the mechanical regularity of the design and the "shameful" construction, noting "walls full of water" and other problems.

"If we cannot build well in the newest and most loudly advertised ways, let us build well in the older, proven ways" he wrote.

Now is a good time to tour Williamsburg Houses. It still has a radically progressive atmosphere. But it also has giant scars along its brick walls and especially the concrete slabs. The water that Hamlin saw in the 30's continued to penetrate the outer walls. Perhaps a tenth of the bricks have spalled off badly and the rest are deteriorating. Internal steel reinforcing bars have rusted, popping off grapefruit-size chunks of concrete.

THE Federal P.W.A. construction workers were inexperienced and not supervised closely enough. They laid the steel reinforcing too close to the edge of the forms into which the concrete was poured.

But there was also a basic design problem: Lescaze's team left out the normal devices — flashing and weepholes — that permit internal water to escape. Rainwater was drawn into the wall at the bottom of each of the chamfered, concrete slabs; which did not have the ridge-like drip caps at the bottom.

Neil Cohen, director of design for the Housing Authority, feels strongly about the architectural significance of Williamsburg Houses and the authority has, voluntarily, approached the Landmarks Preservation Commission for approval of its project.

The buildings are widely considered notable works, but are not designated landmarks. The concrete slabs will be rebuilt, with drip caps, and the modernistic entranceways are restored to something like their original appearance. Every brick will be removed and replaced with new ones to match, about 5.7 million in all, says Douglas McNevin, assistant director of construction.

Most of the repairs are being designed by the engineers Goodkind and O'Dea, and the landmarks issues are being supervised by the architects Vincek & Petrocci.

Two recent alterations — inappropriate new windows and crudely designed brick replacement on the stair towers — will not be remedied, but the Williamsburg Houses are notable for the promises its original architects envisioned and the ones its current owners did not have to make. ■

The 1,622-unit Williamsburg Houses in Brooklyn, built in 1938, will be renovated at a cost of $35 million.

These mortgages are not for everyone — clearly not for those who fear consuming a major asset. And anyone who cannot honestly expect to remain in the home for at least five more years will find origination costs, which can reach $8,000, too steep to make it worthwhile, said Carol Greifer, a director of counseling at Family Services of Nassau County.

Borrowers should also evaluate whether they are old enough to qualify for a meaningful monthly sum. For example, a 62-year-old living in a $150,000 house on Long Island would get $341 compared to $566 for someone who is 75 years old, according to AARP calculations.

Thus, a line of credit could work better than monthly payments, especially for someone with only occasional needs. An evaluation of H.U.D.'s experimental program completed in December 1992 found that nearly three-quarters of the 2,100 borrowers studied opted totally or in part for the line of credit.

The study found the median age of the borrowers was 76. Their homes had a median value of $103,000, the median monthly payment was $401 and median income was $7,600, virtually all of which came from Social Security. Perhaps most significant was that 75 percent of those studied had no children. Thus, concerns about devouring capital that could benefit future generations was not at issue.■

Investor Buys a Major Piece of Stamford

Almost 20 Percent Of Prime Space Downtown Sold

By ELEANOR CHARLES

ALMOST 20 percent of Stamford's 6.4 million square feet of prime downtown office space has been rescued from foreclosure by Zell/Merrill Lynch of Chicago, one of the nation's largest real estate investment concerns.

With the acquisition last month of 1.2 million square feet in five buildings, for which it paid $132 million, Zell/Merrill Lynch Real Estate Opportunity Partners Limited Partnership became the largest office landlord in Stamford, which has a total of 13.6 million square feet of offices.

Most of the newly acquired properties are on Tresser Boulevard: 300 Atlantic Street (on the corner of Atlantic and Tresser), Four Stamford Forum, Six Stamford Forum, and 301 Tresser Boulevard, formerly Eight Stamford Forum and once the headquarters of the Singer Company.

All the structures were built and owned by the F.D. Rich Company, local developers who rebuilt the downtown core under a 1960's urban renewal contract.

Brian Lipson, vice president for Zell/Merrill Lynch acquisitions in Chicago, said that Connecticut was the company's first stop in New England.

"We were waiting for pricing expectations to come into line with market values," he said, "and I suspect that if we had bought these properties earlier we would have paid 20 percent more."

The only Stamford acquisition that was not a Rich property is Canterbury Green, a 100 percent leased office-residential complex that wound up in foreclosure when J.C. Penney, one of the owners, divested itself of its real estate holdings. The Bank of New York sold it, together with 301 Tresser Boulevard, to Zell/Merrill Lynch. The rest of the buildings were bought from Citicorp.

The F.D. Rich family-owned empire began crumbling when overbuilding caught up with it as the recession took hold in the late 80's. Today, of the dozen central-business-district office buildings it once controlled it owns only the 250,000-square-foot Ten Stamford Forum and the 900,000-square-foot Stamford Town Center mall. The rest were taken back by lenders in foreclosures.

Even the Rich company's signature Landmark Towers, an 820,000-square-foot complex of five office buildings that houses the company headquarters, reverted to Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, which had refinanced the complex in 1989 with $114 million.

Joyce Dopkeen/The New York Times

Patrick D. Lerch, who will head the new northeast headquarters of the Zell/Merrill Lynch partnership at Six Stamford Forum in Stamford.

Drawing on one of two $430 million acquisition funds comprising investments from some 30 corporate and public pension funds, Zell/Merrill Lynch "seeks to acquire well-located, well-built properties in markets we believe longterm are good places to be," Mr. Lipson said.

The company buys properties at considerably less than their replacement cost, manages them through six regional offices of its affiliate, First Office Management, and holds them for at least 10 years.

Properties are acquired with 50 percent leverage, so the full value is calculated at twice the amount invested, Mr. Lipson said. Citicorp financed 80 percent of the Rich property acquisitions, but "that will be balanced out by cash purchases elsewhere," said Mr. Lipson. The funds were set up in 1987 and 1991 and a third is expected to be capitalized soon at $500 million.

Excluding the new Stamford acquisitions, Zell/Merrill Lynch owns 72 buildings in 22 states. Its holding company, the Equity Group of Chicago, headed by Samuel Zell, owns a total of 250 properties valued at $5 billion, including the partnership's buildings.

ZELL/MERRILL LYNCH first ventured into Connecticut in November 1991 with the purchase of Shelton Pointe, a 162,000-square-foot building in Shelton, at the northern border of Fairfield County.

"A lot of people have invested in Shelton," said Mr. Lipson, citing the American branch of Auguste-Thouard, a major French real estate firm, and Robert Scinto, a Greenwich developer. "We are all having a good experience there."

In 18 months Shelton Pointe's occupancy has risen from 32 percent to 65 percent. Kevin Foley, the building's leasing agent from Rostenberg-Dorn in Stamford, said "outright purchases like this bring stability to the market and peace of mind to the tenants."

Some $500,000 has been spent upgrading the lobby, landscaping and parking area and installing a fitness room and cafeteria.

By early September a new northeast regional headquarters for the Zell/Merrill Lynch partnership will be established in Stamford off the lobby of Six Stamford Forum. Its function will be to acquire and manage properties from Virginia to Maine. Patrick D. Lerch, vice president of First Office Management, will be in charge.

In addition to increasing occupancy of the newly acquired buildings, which are 80 percent occupied and already producing substantial cash flow, Mr. Lerch said that "there will be a lot of hands-on, service-oriented activity. We want to attract retail and amenity tenants as well as office tenants."

HE said that 300 Atlantic Street, with its accessible, windowed ground floor, was well suited to retailers, while the Forum buildings would accommodate interior service businesses for tenants.

Margaret Carlson, a former Rich employee, is now the leasing agent at First Office Management for 300 Atantic Street, and Four and Six Stamford Forum, with an aggregate of 735,500 square feet, of which 24,000 square feet were rented in the past month.

Among the tenants in the five buildings are Price Waterhouse & Company, ABB Financial Services, American Tobacco Company, Re-Capital Corporation, Hewlett Packard's marketing/sales office and Reuters America's regional office.

Albert B. Ashforth Inc. of Stamford handles leasing for 301 Tresser Boulevard. According to Jeffrey H. Gage, a vice president at Ashforth, the 240,000-square-foot building "is half empty and has one of the largest blocks of vacant space available downtown — floors 12 through 15 containing a total of 90,000 square feet."

Company downsizing has kept vacancies at a persistent 20-plus percent, with rental activity generally sluggish for more than three years. John Rostenberg, a principal at Rostenberg-Dorn, pegs sublease offerings at $12 to $27 a foot and direct space at $17 to $22 a foot. "Landlords are offering lower rent or free rent, but trying to stay away from expensive construction costs," he said.

Mr. Lipson said he believed bargains would continue to be found "even after the recession" because "with all the excess capacity it will be a long time before demand rises enough to push prices up." ■

Letters

Why The Bronx?

To the Editor:

In your Q & A column on April 18 you answer a question by Hymie Kindler of Brooklyn ("Why the Bronx?") by saying that nobody knows why. You then compound your confession of ignorance by repeating an oft-quoted vaudeville joke about people saying that they were going to visit the Broncks.

While it is true that Jonas Bronck, a Swede, was the first European to settle in the Bronx in 1639, when he died in 1643, only the Broncks (Bronx) River was named for him. What is now the Bronx was originally the southern part of Westchester County. In 1874, New York City annexed the area west of the Bronx River and in 1895, the part east of it. Manhattan residents called the territory the Annexed District; those who lived there called it the North Side.

In 1898, the city established the borough system. Since the Bronx River ran through the northernmost borough, it was decided to name it after the river. Thus The Bronx — (with a capital T, since that is part of its name).

Athletic Center

To the Editor:

Your "Athletic Center for Lehman" on March 28 notes that a new $57 million Physical Education Center is to open this fall at Lehman College in the Bronx. What is Chancellor W. Ann Reynolds thinking about when she plans to phase out physical education at all the City Univerisity campuses? Even if this new complex is only for physical education majors, who will they teach if physical education is eliminated from the curriculum as the Chancellor is attempting to do?

Penn Building A Clubhouse

Helpern. That is an important factor if the 10,000 dues-paying members Penn hopes to attract from an area alumni population of 30,000 are not to feel overcrowded. One hospitality industry analyst worried that the new club would be too small to accommodate its own success, characterizing the ratio of dining seats to possible members as "an interesting challenge."

ON the other hand, hotel industry analysts note that the membership goal may be too lofty to begin with.

"Starting up like this is difficult any time you're in a downward economy," said John A. Fox, a director of PKF Consulting, a hotel and real estate consulting firm (and a Cornell graduate), "but Penn has a large and loyal group of alumni."

Mr. Inglis said there was a "cloud of doubt" about the Clinton Administration's plans for tne business entertainment tax deduction. If lowered from the current 80 percent to 50 percent, as some tax analysts deem likely, he said, it could combine with the region's still struggling economy to further erode use of club facilities.

Thomas J. Donnelly, a partner at the accounting firm of Condon, O'Meara, McGinty & Donnelly, which specializes in clubs and nonprofit associations, said:

"It's an easy target. And I think it is much more of a threat for luncheon clubs. A lot of members of university clubs are reimbursed by their employers for their dues. When the price becomes noncompetitive with local restaurants it becomes more difficult to justify those dues to your employer."

But Mr. Fox says that the lower deductibility "could have a bigger impact on public restaurants, because of the loyalty issue."

That loyalty is, after all, what the university clubs are in business for, both to encourage and to reap its benefits.

"The club is a really strong synergy between alums and Cornell," said Fred Eydt, the Cornell Club president.

The members reap the traditional benefits of a social club, from athletic facilities to business contacts, while the universities keep ties to their former charges. The Penn Club, too, will have athletic facilities.

"All the universities today are needful of campaign fundraising," Mr. Eydt said, "so the club keeps people focused on Cornell and strengthens the university for many generations to come."

"It's a practical matter," said Mr. Helpern, the architect. "They are spending a lot of money, but they get that back many times over." ■

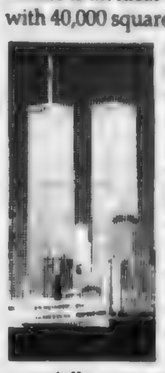
BROWN & WOOD MAKES A CASE FOR THEIR WORLD TRADE CENTER LOCATION.

A Wall Street Law Firm since 1914, Brown & Wood settled at the World Trade Center in 1982.

Located just minutes from financial institution clients, and federal, state and municipal courts, the World Trade Center is an ideal location for law firms–with 40,000 square foot floors that offer a large number of windowed offices, with enough interior space for support functions like libraries and records areas.



In their ten years as World Trade Center tenants, Brown & Wood have continually found the management staff accessible and accommodating–especially now, as Brown & Wood plans to expand their space from 120,000 square feet to 140,000 square feet.

What's more, as one of over 400 companies from 62 countries currently based at the World Trade Center, Brown & Wood enjoys spectacular vistas and an exceptional array of services–including transportation unmatched by any building, on-site shopping and a diverse array of restaurants. All of which makes a strong case for the World Trade Center as an ideal business location.

Commercial Property: The World Trade Center

Charles J. Maikish, the World Trade Center's director, whose watch-alarm still goes off at 12:18 P.M. each day so he can pause for a moment in memory of the six people who died when the bomb went off. "Now we are going to do even more."

Indeed, the signs of post-bomb change are all around. There's a new visitor's desk in both towers, where visitors who once could roam free must sign in before gaining access to the elevators. All tenants carry identification cards now, and some — those that use the building during off-hours, for example — will get ID cards with holograms that are almost impossible to copy.

No one can make it to the bowels of Tower One, once a free-access garage and tenant storage facility, without a security escort. The elevators, the electrical systems, all of the once-revolutionary-but-now-antiquated cogs in the center's physical wheels are being overhauled. And it's hard to miss the two huge chillers on Vesey Street and Liberty Street, temporarily there to make sure the buildings remain cool while the bomb-damaged chillers in the basement, the heart of the air-conditioning system, are repaired.

BUT perhaps most important to tenants, the post-bomb center is a much more tenant-friendly place. Coffee cups and welcoming letters awaited all tenants as they moved back in. The Port Authority forgave any rent for tenants evacuated after the bombing, even though not all leases provided for such. It paid moving costs, and is paying tenants about $150 an employee to cover other costs. It is offering stress counseling to tenants' employees and free parking at the nearby Battery Park Garage for those who used to use the now-gutted garage.

Mr. Maikish and his staff are visiting large tenants every day, smaller ones every week, just to make sure things are going well. And a new team of customer service people is gearing up to make sure that every tenant request, from a paint job to a lease change, is expedited, and with grace.

"Their response to tenants after the blast has definitely helped their tenant relations," said Barry Gosin, the Newmark Real Estate broker who is representing Brown & Wood.

It's quite a change for an office complex that, until recently, was known as one of the city's most arrogantly managed.

Indeed, for all of the 70's and much of the 80's, the Trade Center, with its 10 million square feet of rentable space, was the only Class A space that downtown had to offer. It not only ruled the market, it was the market.

Rents, which could go as high as $55 a foot for high floors, were nonnegotiable. Rarely was a tenant offered more than $20 a foot toward the cost of building offices. Leases were inflexible, with sublets hardly ever allowed. Tenants could wait weeks before a burned-out bulb was changed or before the engineering department would approve a simple office change like a moved wall. The Port Authority made significant profits on any services it did finally provide; Mr. Maikish says it was known to charge as much as $25 for changing a lightbulb.

Cleaning was superficial, and cosmetic maintenance was haphazard. A vandal pulled a veneer strip off one elevator in Tower One and it sat that way for weeks.

"A truly Class A building would fix something like that in two days," said one disgruntled tenant.

Mr. Maikish does not deny the allegations of neglect.

"We were complacent, and our complacency reflected itself in the quality of service," he conceded. "Attention to tenants was simply not pinnacle."

Mr. Maikish insists that all that began to change a couple of years ago, when the Port Authority recognized that it had 3 million square feet coming up for renewal between 1992 and 1995 and that this time it would have to compete for them with the World Financial Center, One Financial Square and other premier buildings that had added 12 million square feet of Class A space to downtown.

"We knew we had to become more flexible and responsive," Mr. Maikish said.

Mr. Maikish says the center has become both. It is riding herd on its own vendors, for example. It now has five cleaning services, not just one, and is giving out only short-term contracts. It also now has a 20-person group that does nothing but handle tenant complaints and requests. In the offing is a separate maintenance group devoted purely to handling tenant requests, so that no tenant gets short shrift if a large number of staff members are called to handle a general maintenance problem in the building's base.

"We no longer feel like we have to deal with all kinds of Port Authority departments when we need something," said John C. Feldcamp, executive director of Brown & Wood, which has 120,000 feet in the center and is looking for at least 10,000 more.

A few months ago Mr. Maikish hired separate representatives to deal with Japanese and Taiwanese tenants, many of whom are more willing to complain to their home office about problems than to confront management. And Mr. Maikish and his staff are regularly visiting Tokyo and other Asian home offices to make sure that they learn of problems before they result in a move.

"We'd hear that our Japanese tenants were looking in midtown, or we'd notice that they were simply not talking to us about expansion space," Mr. Maikish said. "We had to act on the signals we were getting."

It is pretty easy to believe Mr. Maikish that all of the tenant relations changes would have occurred even without the bomb. It is not as easy to figure out what might have happened with the center's physical plant.

Indeed, the bomb went off while the center was in the midst of a five-year, multimillion dollar renovation program that began in 1992. Almost every aspect of that program is getting a post-bomb fillip added in.

John Sotomayor/The New York Times

New communications desks allow monitoring of all areas in the towers.

Take the 250 elevators, all marvels of efficiency when installed more than two decades ago but obsolete by today's standards. They depend on electrical switches; for some years, the authority has planned to replace those with microprocessors, those electronic traffic cops that make sure all elevators are not on the ground floor at the same time.

Now the elevators have emergency lights, operated by battery packs. And the authority may put in magnetic swipes, security devices that will not let an elevator door open on specific floors unless the passenger has an electronically readable identification card.

The center had hoped to have requests-for-proposal out for a new 10-year maintenance and modernization program for the elevators this month and may still do so for the smaller buildings. But for the two towers, where some elevators are still sooty from the bomb, they probably won't be out until September.

THE scheduled overhaul and expansion of the electrical systems is getting another once-over, too. The buildings, built in the pre-fax, pre-personal computer days, are powered from eight Consolidated Edison high-tension feeders that feed into one primary distribution center, which in turn delivers about 3 or 4 watts per square foot through 26 substations; modern telecommunications require more like 8-to-10 watts.

At the time of the bombing, the center had already planned to augment its transformers and add two more high-tension feeders, with an eye to providing those 8 to 10 watts within the next 4 or 5 years. But now engineers are talking about splitting the feeders off into two separate distribution centers. They are expected to decide within two months.

"It would cost a lot and we would no longer have absolute redundancy between the feeders," Mr. Maikish said. "But it would make it harder to knock out the entire system."

The increased use of telecommunications devices, with the concommitant heat they generate, has taxed the building's cooling systems as well. Indeed, many tenants have complained of bad air-conditioning for years.

The center had planned to build a new water line in the fall and to install an extra chiller in 1995. Now it hopes to have the chiller by July. The bomb pretty well knocked out six of the seven existing chillers, but the streetside rentals should carry the air-conditioning until they are fixed.

The center hopes to have five of the seven operating by summer, along with some newer ones. The eventual goal, post-blast, is the same as it was pre-blast: 64,000 tons of chiller capacity, a 15,000-ton increase above what is available now.

Security and fire safety are striding forward, too. Guards now patrol the staircases and a new fire alarm system, complete with audible voice lines directly into each tenant's offices, is in the works.

And, reacting to the difficulty that tenants had spotting signs in the smoke-filled staircases, the center has contracted with the Switzer Group, Manhattan space planners, to put in signs made of a sulfur-based crystalline substance sandwiched within plastic that will literally glow in the dark.

"The law says you must have re-entry signs but no one remembered to pass a law that you had to be able to see them," said Robert Sutter, the Switzer Group's president. The group is also re-evaluating an ongoing project to replace corridor signs and directional signs in the lobbies, all with an eye to how well they would function in a fire.

Now Mr. Maikish and his crew are faced with marketing the spiffed-up center. Many of the Japanese tenants, for example, have leases that expire in 1995 and it is not certain that all — or any — will stay.

"We have not commenced negotiations with anyone, but we certainly have contacted a number of landlords with respect to our space needs," said Robert A. Rabbino Jr., a joint general manager at the Sumitomo Bank Limited, whose lease on three floors in Tower One expires in less than two years.

Meanwhile, the center is holding breakfasts for brokers to acquaint them with its capital program, its more flexible negotiation stance, and its new emphasis on tenant services. It takes out ads whenever a tenant renews and it sent representatives to an international real estate conference to discuss how it has handled the blast damage.

"It is hard to reverse a bad image that builds up through so many years, but we are trying," Mr. Maikish said.

The big sticking point still seems to be the authority's legal department. Its leases are among the town's most intractable and its lawyers have the reputation of drawing negotiations out forever.

"The business staff is cooperative, but the rigidity of the legal department is monumental," said Dan Gronich, head of the Gronich & Company brokerage firm.

MR. MAIKISH said he was now allowing some sublet clauses, and since the bombing, is willing to include various safety and security assurances in leases. "The difference is that now, every clause is subject to negotiation," he said.

But brokers and tenants say negotiations can still be rough, particularly since many tenants now hold out for clauses that cover indemnification and rent abatement in case of future terrorist attacks, as well as clauses specifying the nature of the buildings' safety and security precautions.

Although Mr. Maikish and his crew are willing to discuss all these things, brokers report that they are not necessarily caving in on any of them.

"The port is negotiating as though it is coming from a position of strength," said Michael Burgio, a Cushman & Wakefield broker who is negotiating a deal in the towers. "They say, 'We have enhanced security, we are giving you a better product.' "

Some tenants say they have a point.

"There is no question that we have blast-related issues we want answered in the new lease," said Mr. Feldcamp. "But even though we have more demands, we also have a greater appreciation of the strengths of this building. How many buildings, after all, could have survived that bomb?" ■

Bristol, R.I.

Reincarnating An Old Plant

GROUND was broken here 10 days ago for the first phase of the renovation of about half of the 800,000-square-foot, 18-acre former Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation complex, which now houses an industrial park leasing space to 26 companies.

The Bristol Foundation, the nonprofit developer, plans housing for the elderly, an assisted-care facility, a clinic, shops, and possibly a Y.M.C.A. in the one-, two- and three-story buildings, as well as a "Historic Interpretive Center."

The center will feature exhibits on the history of the factory and the residents of this town of 20,000 who worked there, most of whom were Portuguese and Italian immigrants, said Mark Tigan, the executive director of the foundation. The factory dates to 1864, when it was the National India Rubber Company, the forerunner of the United States Rubber Company.

The first phase of the project will be 48 one-bedroom apartments and one two-bedroom apartment, financed with a $3.5 million grant from the Federal Department of Housing and Urban Development. It is expected to be ready for occupancy by January 1994, Mr. Tigan said.

The architect is the Providence Partnership. The contractor is O. Ahlborg & Sons of Cranston, R.I.

The timing of the second phase, a 50,000-square-foot assisted-care facility, depends on the availability of financing, Mr. Tigan said.

Frederico Pacheco, owner of a local travel agency, led a committee of neighbors that worked over the last year with town officials to come up with a plan for the old complex. At times, more than 100 people turned out for meetings of the committee, which later changed its name to the Mosaico Neighborhood Development Corporation to reflect the town's diverse ethnic heritage.

Mosaico is Portuguese for mosaic,' a term that perfectly describes Bristol's ethnic mix, Mr. Pacheco said.

To be eligible for an apartment in the Mosaico, the development's new name, a tenant must be at least 62 years of age and have an income half or less than the median income of $29,200 for Bristol residents. Tenants pay rent equal to about 30 percent of their income. The H.U.D. grant will make up the difference, Mr. Tigan said.

At its peak in World War II, the rubber factory employed about 6,000 people in the manufacture of rubber-insulated cable and wiring.

Kaiser took over in 1957, manufacturing aluminum cable until it closed the plant in 1977. Lyle Fain, a Providence developer, bought the complex in the early 1980's and developed the industrial park. ■

Changing Look On Main Drag

TWO major real estate transactions on stately Congress Street, this city's main street, are contributing to a change in its character.

The Maine College of Art has bought the once regal six-story Porteous, Mitchell & Brawn department store and plans to renovate the 148,000-square-foot Beaux-Arts classical-style building, putting in an auditorium, classrooms and gallery by late next year. This will double its space and the college hopes to increase its student population of 350.

A block away, two local developers recently bought the 125,000-square-foot former Maine National Bank complex, which covers an entire city block, for $251,000 from Recoll Management, a marketing arm of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Having paid cash for the three-building complex, the developers, Arthur Girard and Michael Scarks, plan to rent out the office space at $4 to $8 a square foot, undercutting the area's current commercial rental rates of $10 to $12 a foot.

Realtors and shopowners suggest that Congress Street, which has been down on its luck and losing retail and office tenants to malls for years, may be reinventing itself and emerging as the new Bohemian and business start-up district of town.

Already, funky clothing stores, new wave jewelers and bookshops have opened, taking advantage of lower rents and filling previously vacant storefronts (late last year the street's commercial/retail vacancy rate was 39 percent). Two to three years ago, those shops would have gravitated to the fashionable Old Port section near the waterfront.

Joseph M. Malone, owner of Malone Commercial Brokers, which played a role in both the Porteous and Maine National Bank sales, predicts the two transactions will do wonders for downtown Portland.

"I think the art school work continues a counter-culture movement on that end of Congress Street," he said. "But here at the former bank building, I don't think we'll attract that type of tenant. We're really too big to accommodate a small retailer, and interior malls have never worked in Portland. I think we're going to attract tenants who are looking for great location in the city that they were never able to afford before." Declining rental rates and the low purchase price of F.D.I.C. properties on Congress Street have made downtown Portland more competitive with new office space in outlying business districts, even when the cost of parking is added in, he said.

The art college, which bought the former Porteous building for $525,000, plans to spend $6 million renovating it and will sell its three current buildings — all on or near Congress Street — to finance the purchase and renovation. It hopes to get $1 million for them and raise the rest without bank loans. ■

2 Communities Being Planned

TWO higher-income residential communities, the Hamlet and Longleaf, are planned for a developing area in Prince Georges County midway between Washington and Annapolis, the state capital.

The communities, just east of Bowie and due to be annexed by it, will open a new sector of the county for development by bringing in water and sewer services. Lot sales to builders would begin at Longleaf later this year and at the Hamlet next year if the county approves the plans.

Bowie, the most active market in the county for new home sales, accounted for nearly half the 371 new home sales in Prince Georges last year. Three state highways intersect there: Route 50, which connects Washington with Annapolis and the Eastern Shore; Route 3 which goes to Baltimore, 18 miles north, and Route 301, which goes south 12 miles to the county seat of Upper Marlboro.

The two new residential developments will be in the largely undeveloped southeast quadrant) of the Route 50/301 intersection, separated from Route 50 by a narrow strip with a car dealership, the site of a future hotel and a farm.

The Hamlet is planned for a 30-acre site that fronted Route 301 until a local road was realigned. A group of regional developers calling themselves Route 301 Associates Limited Partnership originally planned a sports medicine facility there but changed to a mixed-use development after the county revised the zoning in 1991. The Hamlet will have 200 to 250 town houses priced at $180,000 to $200,000 and a village center with retail and small services such as bank branches.

Longleaf's developer, Donatelli & Klein of Bethesda, Md., is planning a community of 252 one-family homes on 113 acres of a 200-acre parcel, once part of a tobacco farm, next to the Patuxent River. The project of $190,000 to $300,000 homes on 10,000-square-foot lots will include open space and amenities like a pool and clubhouse.

Developing the parcels will mean bringing county water and sewer services across Route 301 to the two residential sites and possibly to the properties bordering Route 50.

Bowie, a 13-square-mile city of 38,000, started in the late 19th century as a railroad town but grew rapidly when Levitt and Sons built housing in the area in the 50's and 60's and again in the late 80's when it built the Bowie New Town Center in the heart of the community and residential developments around the edges.

Annexation of the two new communities would reduce residents' county taxes but add city taxes for schools and for sanitation, fire and rescue services as well as access to city recreation amenities. The difference could be from $50 to $150 more annually, depending on the value of the house. ■

REQUEST FOR PROPOSALS

THE TELEPORT SITE DEVELOPMENT

The Teleport

The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey is seeking proposals for the lease and development of one or more parcels of land at The Teleport on Staten Island. These pre-approved development sites range from approximately 4 to 14 acres and are suitable for constructing buildings ranging from 75,000 to 250,000 square feet.

A fully developed infrastructure is in place and an attractive tax incentive package is available.

Located just 11 miles from Manhattan, this 100-acre suburban business park and communications center currently includes five buildings and an 11-acre domestic and international satellite transmission center linked to a regional fiber optic network. The Teleport features reliable, redundant power at one of the lowest rates in the region; an extensive and highly sophisticated electronic and manned security system; cost-effective, superior voice, data and video communications and access to a large, skilled labor force.

Interested parties may request a copy of this RFP by writing to Mr. Abe Friedman, Regional Development Department, Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, One World Trade Center, Room 36 North, New York, NY 10048, or call 212-435-8880. Proposals must be received by June 11, 1993.

MAY

In Montclair is a fun-filled month you won't want to miss! Call us to send you the fabulous guide of daily events.

...BE it's possible to have a truly care-free commute to NY. Wouldn't it be wonderful if it were only steps from this Farmhouse Colonial in Upper Montclair featuring master bedroom with marble fireplace, pocket doors, ultra kitchen and dining room with French doors to patio and lovely yard? $224,000

...BE you need more bedrooms. Wouldn't this charming Glen Ridge Colonial featuring 5 bedrooms, living room with fireplace and family room with skylight be a nice solution? Especially for just $199,000!

...BE entertaining would be more fun with the conveniences of the exceptional "cook's" kitchen in this classic 5 bedroom, Center Hall Colonial in Upper Montclair. Solid cherry cabinetry, microwave, double sinks and ovens, indoor barbecue, all accentuated by charming hand-pegged plank oak floor and expansive windows overlooking lovely yard...get out your cookbook! $429,000.

...BE it's time to put your $ into equity instead of paying rent every month. With properties listed as low as $44,000 and an adorable 4 bedroom Colonial in Bloomfield with lovely kitchen and sliding doors to deck for just $777/Mo (with 10% down and 6% ARM for qualified buyer) you've got a lot of choices!
